Preamble

An Act to amend the law relating to the Transfer of Property by act of parties

Preamble.--Whereas it is expedient to define and amend certain parts of the law relating to the transfer of property by act of parties; it is hereby enacted as follows:--

The true place of a preamble in a statute was at one time the subject of conflicting decisions. The modern rule is that where the enacting part is explicit and unambiguous, the preamble cannot be resorted to, to control, qualify or restrict it; but where the enacting part is ambiguous, the preamble can be referred to, to explain and elucidate it. This rule has been applied to Indian statutes by the Privy Council<sup>1</sup>, and also by the Supreme Court of India.<sup>2</sup>

(1) Define and Amend

The Transfer of Property Act 1882 (TP Act) was intended to define and amend the existing law, and not to introduce any new principle.<sup>3</sup> It embodies principles of equity, justice and good conscience.<sup>4</sup> The chief objects of TP Act were first to bring the rules which regulate the transmission of property between living persons into harmony with the rules affecting its devolution on death and thus, to furnish and complement the work commenced in framing the law of testamentary and intestate succession; and secondly, to complete the code of contract law so far as it relates to immovable property.<sup>5</sup>

(2) Act not Exhaustive

The Act is not exhaustive, and it does not profess to be a complete code.<sup>6</sup> This is apparent from the omission of the word 'consolidate', which occurs, for instance, in the preamble to the Indian Evidence Act 1872.<sup>7</sup> The preamble to the Indian Contract Act 1872 is worded in terms similar to the preamble of TP Act.<sup>8</sup> In Irrawaddi Flotilla Co v Bhugwandas,<sup>9</sup> which was a case under the Contract Act, the Privy Council observed that the said Act did not profess to be a complete code dealing with the law relating to contracts, that is purported to do no more than to define and amend certain parts of that law, and that the legislature did not intend to deal exhaustively with the law relating to contracts.

(3) Legislative Competence

Both the Parliament and the state legislature have the power to make laws with respect to 'Transfer of Property other than agricultural land', which matter is included in entry 6 of the concurrent list in the seventh schedule to the Constitution. Legislation relating to the relationship of landlord and tenant, including rent control with respect to non-agricultural land, will come under entry 6 of list III.<sup>10</sup> The subject of transfer of agricultural land is covered by entry 18 of the state list. A state law relating to the transfer of agricultural land may override the provisions of the TP Act, for instance, as to mortgages of agricultural land.<sup>11</sup> Transfer of agricultural land, whether belonging to scheduled tribes or other persons, would come under entry 18 of list II, which carries with it not only a power to make a law placing restrictions on transfers and alienations of such land including a prohibition thereof, but also the power to make a law to re-open such transfers and alienations.<sup>12</sup> The Supreme Court has held that the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act 1971 in so far it deals with a licensee of premises other than premises belonging to the Central Government, falls in entries 6, 7 and 46 of list III.<sup>13</sup> It is held that Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act 1988, is not an enactment relating to the transfer of property, but is a law relating to trusts and trustees and, therefore, cannot be related to the legislative head 'Transfer of Property' in entry 6 of list III.<sup>14</sup>

(4) By Act of Parties

The Supreme Court, in the case of Bharat Petroleum Corporation Ltd v P Kesavan,<sup>15</sup> has held:

As would appear from the preamble of the Transfer of Property Act, the same applies only to transfer by act of parties. A transfer by operation of law is not validated or invalidated by anything contained in the Act. A transfer which takes place by operation of law, therefore, need not meet the requirement of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act or the Indian Registration Act.

These words exclude transfer by operation of law, ie, by sale in execution,<sup>16</sup> forfeiture, insolvency or intestate succession. It also limits the scope of the Act to transfers inter vivos, and excludes testamentary succession.<sup>17</sup>

(5) By Operation of Law

The principles embodied in some of the provisions have been applied to transfers by the operation of law in some cases.<sup>18</sup>

(6) Rules of Interpretation of Statutes

Before discussing the provisions of the TP Act in detail, it is advisable to state the principal rules for the interpretation of statutes:

(1) A cardinal rule of interpretation of statutes, which is often referred to as the golden rule is that the grammatical sense of the words used should be adhered to, technical words being construed according to their technical meaning, and other words in their most ordinary and popular acceptation.<sup>19</sup>

(2) It is a sound rule of interpretation to take the words of a statute as they stand and to interpret them ordinarily, but when it is contended that the legislature intended by any particular amendment to make substantial changes in the pre-existing law, it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion without considering what the law was prior to the particular enactment, and to see whether the words used in the statue can be taken to effect the change that is suggested as intended.<sup>20</sup>

(3) If the meaning is clear, the court is not at liberty to look at the presumed intention of the legislature. The question for the court is not what the legislature meant, but what language of the Act means. In Salomon v Salomon & Co,<sup>21</sup> Lord Watson said:

Intention of the Legislature is a common but a very slippery phrase, which properly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the Legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a court of law or Equity what the Legislature intended to be done, or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication.

(4) When the literal construction would lead to some absurdity, repugnance or inconsistency, the grammatical sense may be modified so as to avoid that difficulty but no further,<sup>22</sup> but it is a well-known rule that a casus omissus cannot be supplied by a court of law.<sup>23</sup>

(5) The literal construction ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the legislature as apparent from the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated.<sup>24</sup>

(6) The construction should be as far as possible beneficial, ie, to suppress mischief and advance the remedy, if this can be done without violence to the language of the section.<sup>25</sup>

(7) A general Act must not be construed so as to derogate from a special Act.<sup>26</sup> The general maxim is generalia specialibus non derogant. When the legislature has given its attention to a separate subject and made provision for it, the presumption is that a subsequent general enactment is not intended to interfere with the special provision, unless it manifests that intention very clearly. Each enactment must be construed in that respect according to its own subject-matter and its own terms.<sup>27</sup>

(8) Statutes encroaching upon private rights must be strictly construed so as to save those rights as far as possible.<sup>28</sup> An intention to take away property without compensation should not be imputed to a legislature, unless it be expressed in unequivocal terms.<sup>29</sup>

(9) Statutes affecting substantive law or vested rights are not retrospective, unless expressed to be so; but statutes affecting procedure may properly have retrospective effect attributed to them, unless that construction be textually inadmissible.<sup>30</sup> The principles affecting the retrospective operation of statutes have been stated as follows:<sup>31</sup>

- (a) Legislative enactments have no retrospective effect, unless explicitly stated to be so in the enactments themselves.
- (b) Amending statutes should not be construed as having retrospective effect, if they affect vested rights.
- (c) Statutes which are declaratory or explanatory are to be construed as having retrospective effect as they give an authoritative explanation of the words, phrases or clauses used in a statute, and whenever the statute has to be applied the explanation also should be applied.
- (d) No recital in a declaratory or amending statute can render void that which has been declared by the courts to have been rightly done under the law.
- (e) Statutes which affect a mere procedure are retrospective in their nature.

The TP Act, however, expressly enacts in s 2(c) that it is not retrospective.

The retrospective operation of changes introduced by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 1929, has been fully considered by the Full Bench of the Patna High Court with reference to s 92 of the TP Act.<sup>32</sup>

(10) Proceedings of the legislative council are excluded from consideration in the judicial construction of an Act. The debates in the legislative council reports of Select Committees and statements of objects and reasons annexed to a Bill may not be referred to.<sup>33</sup> The Supreme Court has held that though the statement of objects and reasons cannot be taken into account for the purpose of interpreting the words of the section, it gives an indication of what the legislature wanted to achieve.<sup>34</sup>

(11) Headings of sections or groups of sections in the Act have the effect of preambles to those sections, and may be referred to as an aid to construction.<sup>35</sup>

(12) Marginal notes to the sections are not to be referred to for the purpose of construction. The Supreme Court has held that a marginal note cannot be invoked for construction where the meaning is clear.<sup>36</sup>

(13) Illustrations are instances of the practical application of the written law without which law would amount to nothing.<sup>37</sup> Since they explain the meaning of the section, they are useful as aids to construction, but they cannot control the plain meaning of the section.<sup>38</sup> The great usefulness of the illustrations which have, although not part of the sections, been expressly furnished by the legislature as helpful in the working and application of the statute, should not be impaired. The Supreme Court holds the same view.<sup>39</sup>

(14) 'It is an error to rely upon punctuation in construing Acts of the Legislature.'<sup>40</sup>

(15) Provisos to sections have the effect of excepting out of the preceding portion, or of qualifying it; a proviso cannot be construed as enlarging the scope of the enactment.<sup>41</sup> It is well-settled that the proviso and the portion of the section must be construed as a whole, each portion throwing light, if need be, on the rest.<sup>42</sup>

Short Title

'This Act may be called Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Commencement. It shall come into force on the first day of July, 1882.

Extent. It extends in the first instance to the whole of India except the territories which, immediately before the 1st November, 1956, were comprised in Part B States or in the States of Bombay, Punjab and Delhi.

But this Act or any part thereof may by notification in the Official Gazette be extended to the whole or any part of the said territories by the State Government concerned.

And any State Government may from time to time, by notification in the Official Gazette, exempt, either retrospectively or prospectively, any part of the territories administered by such State Government from all or any of the following provisions, namely:<sup>1</sup>

Sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123.

Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing part of this section, sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123 shall not extend or be extended to any district or tract of country for the time being excluded from the operation of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, (16 of 1908), under the power conferred by the first section of that Act or otherwise.

(1) Amendment

The only change made by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 20 of 1929, is to change the year of Registration Act from 1877 to 1908.

(2) Power of State Government

The Privy Council in Empress v Burah<sup>1</sup> upheld the validity of the power conferred on the provincial governments to vary the extent of the TP Act. Subsequent to the enactment of the Constitution the Supreme Court has held that such a power is valid, but the state government or the executive cannot modify the TP Act. As a part of an Act can be extended by an executive authority, it follows that a section or sections also can be picked out and applied.<sup>2</sup>

Though art 162 of the Constitution extends the executive power of a state to the matters with respect to which the legislature of the state has power to make laws, yet, neither the Central Government, nor state government can exercise its executive powers in relation to the aspects of transfer of property which are covered by the TP Act.<sup>3</sup>

(3) Application of Provisions of Act, where Act does not apply, as Rules of Justice, Equity and Good Conscience

The Himachal Pradesh High Court has held that in the territories where the TP Act was not in force, the courts can rely upon the various provisions of the TP Act for guidance, if such provisions are in consonance with principles of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>4</sup> However, this rule may not apply to provisions which embody technical rules.<sup>5</sup>

Repeal of Acts

-- Saving of certain enactments, incidents, rights, liabilities, etc.--In the territories to which this Act extends for the time being the enactments specified in the Schedule hereto annexed shall be repealed to the extent therein mentioned. But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect--

- (a) the provisions of any enactment not hereby expressly repealed;
- (b) any terms or incidents of any contract or constitution of property which are consistent with the provisions of this Act, and are allowed by the law for the time being in force;
- (c) any right or liability arising out of a legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force, or any relief in respect of any such right or liability; or
- (d) save as provided by section 57 and Chapter IV of this Act, any transfer by operation of law or by, or in execution of a decree or order of a Court of competent jurisdiction; and nothing in the second Chapter of this Act shall be deemed to affect any rule of Muhammadan law.

(1) Amendment

The only amendment made in this section by the amending Act 20 of 1929 is to omit the words 'Hindu' and 'or Buddhist' in the last paragraph of the section. As a result of the amendment, chapter II now also applies to Hindus and Buddhists.

(2) Nothing herein Contained

These words refer to the whole Act, and not to this section only.<sup>6</sup>

(3) Clause (a)--Enactments not Expressly Repealed

The TP Act does not apply to patnis which are governed by the Patni Regulation and Bengal Regulation (8 of 1819) because these Regulations have not been expressly repealed by the TP Act.<sup>7</sup> A surrender of land by razinama and

kabulayet under the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not affected by the provisions of the TP Act, and is not void for want of registration.<sup>8</sup> The effect of cl (a) is to maintain intact the statutory force which the legislature has given to local usage in Punjab and Oudh.<sup>9</sup> In a recent decision, the Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that because of this clause, s 59 of the TP Act cannot prevail over o 21, r 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that mortgages executed under that rule need not be attested by two witnesses.<sup>10</sup>

(4) Clause (b)--Saving of Incidents of Contract and of Property

A right of partition is an incident of property held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common which is not affected by the Act, and partition may be made orally.<sup>11</sup> Another such incident would be a right of pre-emption.

A mortgagee is entitled to be reimbursed for all costs reasonably incurred in respect of the mortgage security;<sup>12</sup> and this has been described as an implied term of a mortgage saved by this clause.<sup>13</sup>

(5) Zamindar's Right to Share of Sale-price

In certain areas, the zamindar has a customary right to recover one-fourth of the sale consideration for a house sold by the riyaya. This is a customary right of antiquity mentioned in the wajibularz of the village. It is based not on contract or encumbrance, but arises only on sale and is saved by s 2(c) from the operation of s 55. The riyaya has no saleable interest in a house in an agricultural village, but such a right is given to him on the understanding that if he leaves or abandons it, the zamindar gets one-fourth as zare chahorum. This custom was acknowledged because in settling the house, the zamindar had to make certain investments, and thus the custom matured into a legal force. The custom is not unreasonable or opposed to law.<sup>14</sup>

(6) Clause (c)--Saving of Rights and Liabilities Created before the Act

This clause follows the general rule that in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary, statutes affecting substantive rights are not retrospective. All rights, liabilities and remedies constituted before the TP Act came into force, are left in precisely the same position as if the TP Act had not been passed. Thus, a mortgage executed before the TP Act is not invalid on the ground that it does not comply with the requirement of s 59 as to attestation.<sup>15</sup>

The provisions of the TP Act do not apply to a tenancy created before the TP Act came into force.<sup>16</sup> Section 108 (j) is not retrospective, and a tenancy, which was not transferable before the TP Act, does not become so, by virtue of that section.<sup>17</sup> Provisions of s 108 (o) as to waste do not apply to a lease executed before the Act.<sup>18</sup> Similarly, s 111(d) has no application to leases executed before the TP Act, and a mokarari lease granted before the TP Act is not extinguished by merger in a patni subsequently granted.<sup>19</sup>

(7) Clause (d)-- Transfer by Operation of Law

The TP Act, save and except certain exceptions referred to below, does not apply to transfers by the operation of law, but is limited, as stated in the preamble, to transfers 'by act of parties.' The Supreme Court has held that the provisions of the TP Act have no application in a case where transfer of property takes place by operation of law, and a transfer by the operation of law is not validated or invalidated by anything contained in the TP Act.<sup>20</sup> Transfers by operation of law occur in cases of testamentary and intestate succession, forfeiture, insolvency and court-sales. A purchaser at a court-sale acquires title by operation of law,<sup>21</sup> and at such sales, title is transferred without a registered deed;<sup>22</sup> a purchaser of a debt at an execution sale is not affected by s 135.<sup>23</sup> The title of the auction purchaser is derived from the sale certificate, and not from the dakhalnama which is simply a document of delivery of possession.<sup>24</sup>

Questions have arisen as to whether transfers between parties under orders or directions issued under legislation such as the Essential Commodities Act are 'sales' within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act. It has been held that there is no sale where the element of mutual assent is absent, as is the case when property is compulsorily acquired.<sup>25</sup> The Supreme Court in New India Sugar Mills Ltd v Commr of Sales Tax<sup>26</sup> held that under control legislation, the seller is compelled to sell, and the element of mutual assent is wholly absent. Subsequently, in Vishnu Agencies (Pvt) Ltd v Commercial Tax Officer,<sup>27</sup> the Supreme Court, overruling New India Sugar Mills and following Indian Steel and Wire Products v State of Madras,<sup>28</sup> has held that a mere regulatory law even if it circumscribes the area of free choice does not take away the basic character, or the core of sale from the transaction. Such a law which governs a class, may oblige sellers to deal only with parties holding licences who may buy particular or allotted quantities of goods at specified prices, but an essential element of choice is still left to the parties between whom agreements took place. The court held that cases<sup>29</sup> of compulsory acquisition by the state stand on a different footing since in such cases, there is neither any question of offer and acceptance, nor of consent, either express or implied.

The principle of these decisions must be applied with caution to the provisions of TP Act, as an involuntary 'sale' is not necessarily a transfer by the operation of law. Legislature can modify, annul and substitute the contracts inter-vivos. Therefore, when by a legislative provision parties to the lease are substituted, it cannot be held that there is assignment or transfer of the lease or sub-letting of the premises, by the lessee to the person or authority in whom the leasehold rights are vested by operation of law.<sup>30</sup>

However, although s 2(d) makes the TP Act inapplicable to transfers by operation of law, the principle of some sections, for instance s 36,<sup>31</sup> s 44,<sup>32</sup> and s 53<sup>33</sup> has been applied to such transfers.

Exception as to s 57 and chapter IV of the Act

An exception is made with reference to s 57 and chapter IV as the latter provides for the transfer and extinction of a mortgagor's interest by a decree of the court, and the former provides for the discharge of encumbrances by order of a court. With reference to these sections, s 2(d) overrides the provisions of s 5.<sup>34</sup>

(8) Mahomedan Law

Section 2 says that 'nothing in the second Chapter of this Act shall be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan law.' The reason for this provision is that some of the rules of law differ from the general rules as to the transfer of property enacted in chapter II. Thus, a Mahomedan may settle property in perpetuity for the benefit of his descendants, provided there is an ultimate gift in favour of charity.<sup>35</sup>

This rule is not affected by s 13 and 14 of the TP Act. The Mahomedan law of gifts is expressly saved by s 129. Under that law, writing is not essential to the validity of a gift,<sup>36</sup> but delivery of possession or of such possession as the subject-matter of the gift is susceptible of, is necessary for a transfer by way of gift.<sup>37</sup>

Although s 2 saves rules of Mahomedan law, it does not follow that the general rules in chapter II cannot apply to Mahomedan transfers. These general rules are excluded only if there is an inconsistent rule of Mahomedan law. Where there is no inconsistent rule of Mahomedan law, the sections in chapter II apply proprio vigore, for all that s 2 says is that nothing in chapter II shall be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan law. However, in any case not covered either by the sections in chapter II or by Mahomedan law, the English law is applied on the ground of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>38</sup>

(9) Hindu Law

The TP Act as it stood before the amending Act 20 of 1929, also saved rules of Hindu law. The word 'Hindu' has been omitted as the differences between that law and the TP Act have now been removed. These differences were:

- (1) The rule in Tagore v Tagore<sup>39</sup> and Chundi Churn v Sidheswari,<sup>40</sup> that bequests and transfer in favour of unborn persons are wholly void, was in conflict with ss 13, 14 and 20 of the TP Act. The Hindu law on this subject had been modified by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act 1916, Madras Act 1914, and Act 8 of 1921, which validated such transfers. These Acts have been amended by ss 11, 12 and 13 of Act 21 of 1929, and the effect of the amendments is that subject to the limitations in chapter II of TP Act and in ss 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, no transfer inter vivos, or by will of property by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such disposition. The TP Act is in consonance with these amendments and so the word 'Hindu' is omitted in this section.
- (2) Another difference was the rule enacted in ss 15 and 16 of the TP Act before the amendment in 1929, that if a transfer to a class fails as to some of its members by reason of remoteness, it fails as to the whole class. This is not Hindu law, and the sections have been amended so as to accord with the law.

(10) Rule of Damdupat

The Hindu rule of damdupat, under which interest exceeding principal cannot be received at any one time, ceases to operate from the date of a suit on a mortgage.<sup>41</sup> There are conflicting decisions as to whether the rule applies in the case of mortgages governed by the TP Act, it being held by Madras High Court that it does not,<sup>42</sup> and by Bombay and Calcutta High Courts,<sup>43</sup> that it does. The amendment of s 2(d) by Act 20 of 1929 does not affect those decisions.

(11) Buddhist Law

Prior to 1929, the TP Act saved rules of Buddhist law, but the words 'or Buddhist' which occurred in s 2(d) have now been omitted.

(12) Government Grants

Government grants are exempted from the operation of the TP Act by s 2 of the Government Grants Act 1895. That Act excludes the operation of the TP Act to transfers made by or on behalf of the government.<sup>44</sup>

Where there is ambiguity in the document of grant, the terms of the grant have to be construed strictly against the grantor and in favour of the grantee.<sup>45</sup>

Interpretation-clause

--In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context,--

'immovable property' does not include standing timber, growing crops, or grass;

'instrument' means a non-testamentary instrument;

'attested', in relation to an instrument, means and shall be deemed always to have meant attested by two or more witnesses each of whom has seen the executant sign or affix his mark to the instrument, or has seen some other person sign the instrument in the presence and by the direction of the executant, or has received from the executant a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark, or of the signature of such other person, and each of whom has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant; but it shall not be necessary that more than one of such witnesses shall have been present at the same time, and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary;

'registered' means registered in any part of the territories to which this Act extends under the law for the time being in force regulating the registration of documents;

'attached to the earth' means--

- (a) rooted in the earth, as in the case of trees and shrubs;
- (b) imbedded in the earth, as in the case of walls or buildings; or
- (c) attached to what is so imbedded for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached;

'actionable claim' means a claim to any debt, other than a debt secured by mortgage of immovable property or by hypothecation or pledge of movable property or to any beneficial interest in movable property not in the possession, either actual or constructive, of the claimant, which the Civil Courts recognise as affording grounds for relief, whether such debt or beneficial interest be existent, accruing, conditional or contingent;

'a person is said to have notice' of a fact when he actually knows that fact, or when, but for wilful abstention from an inquiry or search which he ought to have made, or gross negligence, he would have known it.

Explanation I.--Where any transaction relating to immovable property is required by law to be and has been effected by a registered instrument, any person acquiring such property or any part of, or share or interest in, such property shall be deemed to have notice of such instrument as from the date of registration or, where the property is not all situated in one sub-district, or where the registered instrument has been registered under sub-section (2) of section 30 of the Indian Registration Act 1908, (16 of 1908), from the earliest date on which any memorandum of such registered instrument has been filed by any Sub-Registrar within whose subdistrict any part of the property which is being acquired, or of the property wherein a share or interest is being acquired, is situated: Provided that --

- (1) the instrument has been registered and its registration completed in the manner prescribed by the Indian Registration Act 1908, (16 of 1908), and the rules made thereunder,
- (2) the instrument or memorandum has been duly entered or filed, as the case may be, in books kept under section 51 of that Act, and
- (3) the particulars regarding the transaction to which the instrument relates have been correctly entered in the indexes kept under section 55 of that Act.

Explanation II.-- Any person acquiring any immovable property or any share or interest in any such property shall be deemed to have notice of the title, if any, of any person who is for the time being in actual possession thereof.

Explanation III.-- A person shall be deemed to have had notice of any fact if his agent acquires notice thereof whilst acting on his behalf in the course of business to which that fact is material:

Provided that, if the agent fraudulently conceals the fact, the principal shall not be charged with notice thereof as against any person who was a party to or otherwise cognizant of the fraud.

(1) Amendments

The only amendment made in this section by the amendment Act of 1929 is with regard to the definition of 'a person is said to have notice'.

(2) Immovable Property--general

The distinction between movable and immovable property was explained by Holloway J in an old case<sup>46</sup> decided by Madras High Court, as follows:

Movability may be defined to be the capacity in a thing of suffering alteration of the relation of place immovability in capacity for such alteration. If, however, a thing cannot change its place without injury to the quality by virtue of which it is, what it is, it is immovable. Certain things such as a piece of land are in all circumstances immovable. Other things such as trees attached to the ground are, so long as they are so attached, immovable; when the severance has been effected they become movable.

The definition of 'immovable property' in s 3(26) of the General Clauses Act is not exhaustive. That definition is as follows:

Immovable property shall include land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth.

The TP Act defines the phrase 'attached to the earth, but gives no definition of immovable property beyond excluding standing timber, growing crops and grass. These are no doubt excluded because they are only useful as timber, corn and fodder after they are severed from the land. Before they are so severed, they pass on transfer of the land under s 8 as things attached to the earth.

A 'benefit to arise out of land' is an interest in land and, therefore, immovable property. The Registration Act, however, expressly includes as immovable property benefits arising out of land, hereditary allowances, rights of way, lights, ferries and fisheries.

From a combined reading of the definition of 'immovable property' in s 3 of the TP Act and s 3(5) of the General Clauses Act, it is evident that in an immovable property, there is neither mobility, nor marketability as understood in the excise law.<sup>47</sup>

(3) Various items of Property

The definition of immovable property in the General Clauses Act applies to TP Act.<sup>48</sup> Since the definition in the TP Act is negative and not exhaustive, s 3(26) of General Clause Act applies except as modified by the definition in the first clause of s 3.<sup>49</sup> In the absence of a special definition, general definition must prevail.<sup>50</sup>

The following have been held to be immovable property:

A tree (except standing timber),<sup>51</sup> varashasan or annual allowance charged on land;<sup>52</sup> a right to collect dues at a fair held on a plot of land;<sup>53</sup> a haat or market;<sup>54</sup> a right to possession and management of a saranjam;<sup>55</sup> a malikana;<sup>56</sup> a right to collect or jana;<sup>57</sup> a life interest in the income of immovable property;<sup>58</sup> a right of way;<sup>59</sup> a ferry;<sup>60</sup> a fishery;<sup>61</sup> a lease of land.<sup>62</sup> The Supreme Court has held that trees, which at the time of agreement for sale, were mere saplings on the land would vest in the transferee.<sup>63</sup> Right of enjoyment of immovable property under a lease (s 105) is immovable property, and would pass under a will which uses the words 'all my movable and immovable properties'.<sup>64</sup> The right of enjoyment contemplated by s 105 is an interest in the immovable property. The agreement of lease confers on the lessee the right to possess the immovable property which is subject matter of the lease. Where the words used in the will were 'all my movable and immovable properties', those words would cover a tenancy also.<sup>65</sup> It has been held by the Supreme Court<sup>66</sup> that a right to enter upon land and to carry away fish from a lake is a right to profits a prendre and that it amounts to immovable property in India as a benefit arising from land. Similarly, a right to enter upon land and remove trees has been held by the Supreme Court to require registration.<sup>67</sup> A right to graze over the land of another is a profit.<sup>68</sup> Under these decisions, right to profits a prendre are benefits arising from land, and, therefore, immovable property, unless they relate to standing timber, growing crops or grass, which are specifically excluded by s 3. A contract for the purpose of felling, cutting, obtaining and removing bamboo from forest areas 'for the purpose of converting the bamboo into paper pulp or for purposes connected with the manufacture of paper or in any connection incidental therewith' was held to be a grant of a profit a prendre, or a benefit to arise out of land.<sup>69</sup> A right given to rear lac has been held to amount to a loan interest in immovable property,<sup>70</sup> and so is a right to collect rents from tenants who pay for the use and occupation of land.<sup>71</sup> On the other hand, a royalty is not immovable property;<sup>72</sup> nor a right to recover maintenance though charged on land;<sup>73</sup> nor the right of a purchaser to have the land purchased registered in his name.<sup>74</sup>

With reference to the Limitation Act 1963, the Privy Council said that the words 'immovable property' were used as something less technical than 'real', and included all that would be real property under English law and possibly more, and that if the nature and quality of the property can only be determined by Hindu law and usage, the Hindu law may properly be invoked for the purpose.<sup>75</sup> Accordingly, a todayira's hak or an inamdar's right to an annual payment from a village is immovable property.<sup>76</sup> For the same reason, a priest's right to recover dues at a funeral;<sup>77</sup> a right granted by the Peshwas to levy toll on exports of grain;<sup>78</sup> and a right of assessment<sup>79</sup> have been held to be immovable property. On the other hand, a pala or turn of worship is movable property.<sup>80</sup> A yajman vritti though treated as immovable property, is not immovable property in the proper sense of the word and the assignment of a right to collect offerings from

yajmans for a period of years is not a lease.<sup>81</sup> Similarly, the amount payable by a yajman to a panda when the former visits the holy place is not immovable property.<sup>82</sup> A vested remainder is immovable property.<sup>83</sup> Plant and machinery permanently embedded in the earth with an intention to use it as such has to be construed as immovable property.<sup>84</sup>

(4) Mortgages

An equity of redemption is immovable property,<sup>85</sup> and so is the mortgagee's interest in the immovable property mortgaged.<sup>86</sup> There are many conflicting decisions as to whether a mortgage debt is immovable property, but since a mortgage debt has been excluded from the definition of an actionable claim by Act 2 of 1900, it seems that a mortgage debt is for all intents and purposes, immovable property,<sup>87</sup> though for the purposes of attachment it is treated as movable property.<sup>88</sup> A Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court has said that a mortgage, being a transfer of an interest in immovable property, is immovable property, and that a suit to enforce a mortgage is a suit for land under the Letters Patent of the Chartered High Courts.<sup>89</sup>

(5) Standing Timber

Standing timber are trees fit for use for the purpose of building or repairing houses.<sup>90</sup> This is an exception to the general rule that growing trees are immovable property.<sup>91</sup> In order that trees may be considered to be standing timber, they must first be trees whose wood is suitable for use for building houses, bridges, ships, etc.<sup>92</sup> In English law, this would refer to oak, ash or elm trees;<sup>93</sup> in India, neem, shisham trees,<sup>94</sup> babul trees,<sup>95</sup> or teak trees<sup>96</sup> have been held to be standing timber. It has been held in some decisions that if trees are of the categories mentioned above, they are standing timber, irrespective of when they are intended to be cut.<sup>97</sup> It is submitted that those decisions ignore the meaning underlying the expression, standing timber. Had it been the intention of the legislature to exclude from the definition of immovable property all timber trees, it would have been easy to say so. If a tree is a growing tree, drawing sustenance from the soil, it is immovable property; where, however, it is to be cut soon, the amount of sustenance it will draw from the soil is negligible, and is to be disregarded. This distinction is well brought out by Sir Edward Vaughan Williams in a passage cited by Lord Coleridge CJ in Marshall v Green:<sup>98</sup>

The principle of these decisions appears to be this, that wherever at the time of the contract it is contemplated that the purchaser should derive a benefit from the further growth of the thing sold from further vegetation and from the nutriment to be afforded by the land, the contract is to be considered as for an interest in land; but where the process of vegetation is over, or the parties agree that the thing sold shall be immediately withdrawn from the land, is to be considered as a mere warehouse of the thing sold, and the contract is for goods.

In a separate but concurring judgment in Shantabai v State of Bombay,<sup>99</sup> Bose J has adopted the same test; and the same view has been taken in some other decisions.<sup>1</sup>

A fruit-bearing tree would not be standing timber, and would be classed as immovable property;<sup>2</sup> in areas, however, where mango trees are used for building or repairing houses, it may be standing timber.<sup>3</sup> A mahua tree is not standing timber;<sup>4</sup> nor palm or date-trees used for the purpose of drawing toddy.<sup>5</sup> In execution of a decree passed in a money suit, the trees and bamboo clumps in agricultural lands of the plaintiffs, who were having half-share in the land and were not parties to the money suit, were auctioned, treating the trees and bamboo clumps to be movable property (being standing timber). However, for nearly 10 years thereafter, no effort was made by the purchasers to cut the trees as timber, and there was nothing to show that the purchasers made any effort to either seek an auction of trees in order to share half the price for which they may be sold, or in any way to seek partition of same. It could not be presumed that the purchasers actually intended to cut away the trees as timber. Thus, the trees and bamboo clumps must be held to be immovable property and the Small Cause Court did not have jurisdiction to proceed to execute the decree by sale of the trees, treating them as 'movable property'.<sup>6</sup>

If all the factors go to indicate that the parties intended to deal with the tree as timber, then it would be called standing timber. Standing timber is not 'immovable property' and a document relating thereto, does not require registration.<sup>7</sup>

(6) Growing Crops

These are not limited to annual crops or emblems as they are called in English law. Growing crops have been held to include all vegetable growths, which have no existence apart from their produce such as pan leaves<sup>8</sup> and sugarcane.<sup>9</sup>

(7) Grass

Grass is movable property, but it would appear that a right to cut grass would be an interest in land and, therefore, immovable property. A sale of growing grass to be moved and made into hay by the purchaser has been held in English law to be an interest in land,<sup>10</sup> but not so, if the vendor has to cut the grass and deliver it to the purchaser.<sup>11</sup> A lease of a mango grove entitling the lessee to the grass growing on the land is a lease in respect of immovable property. The definition does not make this distinction. In a case decided by full Bench of Madras High Court case,<sup>12</sup> Collins CJ said:

It has long been settled that an agreement for the sale and purchase of growing grass, growing timber or underwood, or growing fruit, not made with a view to their immediate severance and removal from the soil and delivery as chattels to the purchaser, is a contract for the sale of an interest in land.

(8) Movable Property

There is no definition of movable property in the TP Act. Movable property has been defined in the General Clauses Act to mean 'property of every description except immovable property'. The Registration Act defines movable property to include property of every description excluding immovable property, but including standing timber, growing crops and grass.<sup>13</sup> It has recently been held by the Supreme Court that electricity is a movable property.<sup>14</sup>

(9) Instrument

The definition of movable property excludes a will. The word instrument is used in the sense defined in Somu v Rangammal<sup>15</sup> as being not only evidence of the transaction, but the transaction itself.

(10) Attested

The definition of the word 'attested' was inserted by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 27 of 1926, and was further amended by the insertion of the words 'and shall be deemed always to have meant' by the Repealing and Amending Act 1927, to show that the definition had retrospective effect.

Section 63 of the Indian Succession Act read with s 68 of the Evidence Act and s 3 of the TP Act makes a mandatory obligation to have the document attested, and evidence of such attestation be made available before the court at the time of the trial.<sup>16</sup>

In English law, attestation implies that the attesting witness was present at execution, and can testify that the deed was executed voluntarily by the proper person.<sup>17</sup> Prior to 1912, the courts in India were sharply divided as to whether the word is used in this narrow sense in the TP Act, or whether it includes attestation on admission of execution as in the case of Indian Succession Act. The Allahabad and Bombay High Courts put the latter wider construction upon the word,<sup>18</sup> while the Madras and Calcutta High Courts favoured the narrow construction,<sup>19</sup> subject perhaps to relaxation in the case of pardanashin women.<sup>20</sup> In 1912, however, the Privy Council in the case of Shamu Patter v Abdul Kader,<sup>21</sup> held that an attesting witness must have seen the executant sign. The Transfer of Property (Validating) Act 1917 was passed to validate instruments attested on admission of execution in reliance on the decisions by Allahabad and Bombay High Court. Shamu Patter's case was followed until the enactment of Act 27 of 1926, which inserted in the TP Act a definition including attestation on acknowledgement of execution.<sup>22</sup> The TP Act being declaratory of the law, was held in the undermentioned case<sup>23</sup> to be retrospective. In other cases, however, it was said that the words 'attest means' cannot have the same meaning as 'attest always meant',<sup>24</sup> and the legislature by Act 10 of 1927 further amended the definition by adding after the word 'means', the words 'and shall always be deemed to have meant.' This makes it clear that the definition is retrospective.<sup>25</sup>

To attest is to bear witness to a fact. It means signing of the document to signify the attestor, and his witness to the execution of the document. An attesting witness is one who signs the document in the presence of the executor after seeing the execution of the document, and after receiving a personal acknowledgement from the executant as regards the execution of the document.<sup>26</sup>

The essential conditions of a valid attestation are that two or more witnesses have seen the executant sign the instrument, or have received from him a personal acknowledgement of his signature, and each of them has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant to bear witness to this fact; it is essential that the attesting witness has put his signature animus attestandie, ie, for the purpose of attesting the signature.<sup>27</sup>

The essential ingredients of the proof of attestation are that it is necessary that the person relying upon a document must establish that the executant has signed or put thumb impression before the attesting witness, and the attesting witness must sign in presence of executant.<sup>28</sup> It is necessary for a party relying upon an attested document to plead specifically both the execution and attestation of it.<sup>29</sup>

The burden is on the propounder to prove due and valid execution of the will. The propounder is required to show by satisfactory evidence that the will was signed by the attestator, and that at the relevant point of time the attestator was in a sound and disposing state of mind, and that he understood the nature and the fact of dispossession when he put his signature to the document out of his own free will. When such clinching evidence is adduced in support of the will and the witnesses are uninterested and satisfactory, the court would be justified in making the finding in favour of the propounder. If such evidence is brought on record which is clinching and proves the execution and attestation to be genuine and valid, then the burden would shift on the objector.<sup>30</sup>

(11) Who may Attest

A party to a deed cannot be an attesting witness, for the object of attestation is protection against fraud and undue influence.<sup>31</sup> However, a person interested in the transaction, such as a person interested in the money advanced under a mortgage, may be an attesting witness if he is not a party to the deed;<sup>32</sup> and the person who advanced the money may attest a mortgage in favour of his benamidar.<sup>33</sup> As regards a scribe, the Supreme Court has held that the effect of subscribing a signature on the part of the scribe is not of the same status as that of the attesting witness. The animus to attest is not available so far as the scribe is concerned: he is not a witness to the will, but a mere writer of the will.<sup>34</sup>

An illiterate person may attest the signature of the executant by making his mark,<sup>35</sup> or the scribe may sign for him, if so authorised,<sup>36</sup> but not otherwise.<sup>37</sup>

Where the deed was written in English; the executant was an old illiterate lady not knowing English; no evidence was led to show that the contents of the deed were explained to her; and the attesting witnesses also did not know English; it was held that the execution was invalid.<sup>38</sup>

The law in India contains well-known principles for the protection of persons, who transfer their property to their own disadvantage, when they do not have the usual means of fully understanding the nature of the effect of what they are doing, on account of certain disabilities. It also held that the disposition of property made by such a disabled person must be substantially understood and must really be the mental act, as against the execution which is a mere physical act of the person who makes it.<sup>39</sup>

Where a person executes a deed as a power of attorney or an agent of another, he is a party to the deed, and he cannot attest his own signature.<sup>40</sup>

(12) Forming Attestation

Attestation need not be in any particular form, a mere signature is sufficient;<sup>41</sup> it need not be made at any particular place in the deed,<sup>42</sup> but cannot take place before the execution of the deed.<sup>43</sup> However, the section requires that the attesting witness should have signed in the presence of the executant;<sup>44</sup> otherwise the deed is not validly attested even though the attestor did actually witness execution.<sup>45</sup> Where the executant, a pardanashin lady, sitting behind a curtain, put her hand out and made her thumb impression on the deed in sight of the witness and then her husband signed, and then the attesting witnesses signed as such, the Privy Council held that the witnesses signed 'in the presence of the executant' and the document was duly attested.<sup>46</sup> However, where one out of two witnesses to a mortgage bond signed his name as an attesting witness for himself and on behalf of the other witness in the latter's presence, the attestation was valid though the other witness did not make his mark.<sup>47</sup> Where two deeds were prepared and executed as a part of one transaction, but the marginal witnesses were not common, it was held that merely from the circumstance that the disputed agreement had another set of marginal witnesses, it could not be inferred that the document was forged or fictitious.<sup>48</sup>

Scribe as Attesting Witness

It is necessary that the attesting witness should have signed for the purpose of authenticating the signature of the executant,<sup>49</sup> and not as a scribe,<sup>50</sup> or as a person merely indicating his consent to the transaction.<sup>51</sup> The Supreme Court has held that the effect of subscribing a signature on the part of the scribe is not of the same status as that of the attesting witness. The animus to attest is not available so far as the scribe is concerned: he is not a witness to the will but a mere writer of the will.<sup>52</sup> A scribe who has signed on behalf of a party, eg an illiterate mortgagor, cannot be an attesting witness for that would amount to attestation of his own signature.<sup>53</sup> However, where an illiterate mortgagor has made his mark himself and the scribe wrote a description of the mark beside it, he was held to be competent to sign as an attesting witness.<sup>54</sup>

A scribe, however, may perform a dual role. He may be an attesting witness as well as the writer. The fact that he signed as an attesting witness, that he did so with the necessary animus to attest, must be duly proved.<sup>55</sup> That is also the case with identifying witnesses.<sup>56</sup> A person can be called an attesting witness when he has witnessed the execution of the document, and has put his signature by describing himself as an attesting witness. Where a person had put his signatures on the document both, as a scribe and as an attesting witness, the inference is that he functioned both as scribe and as an attesting witness.<sup>57</sup>

(13) Registering Officer as Attesting Witness

There was a conflict of decisions as to whether the signature of the registering officer and of the attesting witnesses on the registrar's endorsement made to satisfy the requirements of the Registration Act, constitute a valid attestation if made in the presence of the executant. Some decisions had held such attestations to be valid,<sup>58</sup> but there were contrary decisions.<sup>59</sup> It was submitted in previous editions of this work that the answer to this question would depend on whether the signatures were made with the necessary animus to attest. In Abdul Jabbar v Venkata Sastri,<sup>60</sup> the Supreme Court has held that such signatures can only amount to a valid attestation if the attesting witnesses had put their signatures with such animus; the court further held that ordinarily the registering officer put his signature in the performance of his statutory duty, and not with an intention to attest.

Proof of an Attested Instrument

Proof of an attested instrument is according to ss 68 to 71 of the Indian Evidence Act. The amendment of s 68 by Act 31 of 1926 makes it unnecessary to call any attesting witness in the case of a deed, unless the execution of the deed is specifically denied by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.<sup>61</sup> Where execution is specifically denied, at least one attesting witness must be called to prove the deed, if there be one alive, and subject to the process of the court. If the attesting witnesses are dead, their signatures can be proved by evidence of handwriting.<sup>62</sup> This is not necessary if execution is admitted;<sup>63</sup> but the admission must be not only of execution but of due execution;<sup>64</sup> for an admission will not render valid a document which the evidence shows to be invalid in law.<sup>65</sup> It has also been held that an admission will not suffice if it is established on evidence that the document has not been duly attested.<sup>66</sup> The admission by one mortgagor will not dispense with the necessity of proof against the other.<sup>67</sup> However, even where the execution of a mortgage is admitted, the party must prove that it was duly attested.<sup>68</sup>

(14) Attestation as Proof of Consent

Mere attestation does not effect an estoppel, for attestation does not fix an attesting witness with knowledge of the contents of the document.<sup>69</sup> Attestation does not of itself imply consent;<sup>70</sup> though there may be circumstances which show that the attesting witness had knowledge of the contents of the document he attested and consented to.<sup>71</sup> An attesting witness is not estopped by his mere signature, unless it can be established by independent evidence that to the signature an express condition was attached to the effect that it was intended to convey something more than a mere witnessing to the execution, and was meant as involving consent to the transaction.<sup>72</sup>

(15) Registered

The registration must be valid according to the law for the time being in force. Thus, if the description is not sufficient to identify the property;<sup>73</sup> or if there is a fraud on the law of registration;<sup>74</sup> or if the property is situated in a different circle;<sup>75</sup> or if the deed was not presented by the proper person;<sup>76</sup> or if the description is insufficient to identify the property,<sup>77</sup> the registration is void.

(16) Attached to the Earth

The phrase 'attached to the earth' occurs in the definition of immovable property in the General Clauses Act, and also in s 8 of TP Act with reference to the legal incidents of immovable property which pass, without express mention, on transfer; and again in s 108(h) with reference to things a lessee may remove. Section 3 defines the expression 'attached to the earth' as including:

- (a) things rooted in the earth such as trees;
- (b) things embedded in the earth such as buildings; and
- (c) things attached to what is so embedded, such as doors and windows.

(17) English and Indian Law of Fixtures

The English law as to fixtures is based on the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit<sup>78</sup> as to trees, and quicquid inaedificatur solo, solo cedit<sup>79</sup> as to buildings, the application of these maxims is varied by a plethora of exceptions in favour of a tenant, and in favour of trade fixtures. The term 'fixture' has no precise meaning in English law and is not found in Termes de la Ley,<sup>80</sup> but it is generally applied to something annexed to the freehold. The classification as immovable property of things attached to the earth, bears some analogy to the English law of fixtures, but the maxims on which the English law is founded do not generally apply in India. Long before the TP Act was enacted, Paramanick's case<sup>81</sup> settled that it was the common law of India that buildings and other improvements do not by the mere accident of their attachment to the soil become the property of the owner of the soil. The general rule laid down by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in the above mentioned case was as follows:

We think it should be laid down as a general rule that, if he who makes the improvement is not a mere trespasser, but is in possession under any bona fide title or claim of title, he is entitled either to remove the materials restoring the land to the state in which it was before the improvement was made, or to obtain compensation for the value of the building if it is allowed to remain for the benefit of the owner of the soil--the option of taking the building, or allowing the removal of the material remaining with the owner of the land, in those cases in which the building is not taken down by the builder during the continuance of any estate he may possess.

The Mahomedan law is the same.<sup>82</sup> The Indian legislature has departed from the English law of fixtures in s 2 of the Mesne Profits and Improvements Act 1855, corresponding to s 51 of TP Act,<sup>83</sup> and again in s 108(h) of TP Act dealing with the lessee's right to remove fixtures.<sup>84</sup> The TP Act inclines to the law as recognised by Hindu and Mahomedan jurisprudence.<sup>85</sup>

(18) Things Rooted in the Earth

Trees and shrubs rooted in the earth are immovable property according to the definition in the General Clauses Act, but this definition is subject to the exception made in TP Act as to standing timber, growing crops or grass. In Rustomjee Edulji Sheth v Collector of Tanna,<sup>86</sup> the judicial committee said that the trees upon the land were part of the land, and that the right to cut down and sell those trees was incident to the proprietorship of the land. In the case of Suresh Chand v Kundan,<sup>87</sup> the Supreme Court has held that the standing trees being embedded in the earth are part of the land, and if there is any transfer of property and, unless there is any expressed or implied different intention appearing in the agreement, the interest in the property would also include anything attached with the land which is agreed to be sold. It was also held that trees, which at the time of agreement for sale were mere saplings on the land, would vest in the transferee. Trees growing out of a garden wall belong to the owner of the garden,<sup>88</sup> a mortgage with possession of a fruit bearing tree with the intention that the mortgagee is to enjoy the fruit but not fell the tree, is a mortgage of immovable property.<sup>89</sup>

Trees and shrubs may be sold apart from the land, to be cut and removed as wood, and in that case, they are movable property.<sup>90</sup> However, if the transfer includes the right to fell the trees for a term of years, so that the transferee derives a benefit from further growth, the transfer is treated as one of immovable property.<sup>91</sup> However, the fact that a permit to fell trees extends over a period of several years does not necessarily imply that the transferee is to enjoy the benefit of further growth, and a permit to fell and remove trees for four years has been held to be a grant of movable property.<sup>92</sup> A right to collect lac from trees has been held to be immovable property.<sup>93</sup>

In a case,<sup>94</sup> where an agreement under which the plaintiff was given the right to remove soil and earth from the defendant's land, and was to level the plots after removal, it was held to be an agreement for sale of an interest in land. Where, however, there was a contract to draw and remove sludge from a tank and a lagoon, which was continuously being pumped into the tank and the lagoon, the Calcutta High Court held that the sludge was not immovable property as it had not lain long enough to become part of the earth, and had retained its identity.<sup>95</sup>

(19) Things Embedded in the Earth

A house being embedded in the earth is immovable property, and this is so even if it is sold for enjoyment as a house with an option to pull it down.<sup>96</sup> Under English law, the general rule is that whatever is annexed to the freehold becomes part of the realty under the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit.<sup>97</sup> This maxim does not apply in India; nevertheless the question whether a chattel is embedded in the earth so as to become immovable property is decided by the same principles as those which determine what constitutes an annexation to the land under English law. This is a question which is difficult to determine. The classic instance is an anchor which may be embedded in the land temporarily to hold a ship, or permanently to support a suspension bridge. In Holland v Hodgson<sup>98</sup> Blackburn J said:

There is no doubt that the general maxim of the law is that what is annexed to the land becomes part of the land; but it is very difficult if not impossible, to say with precision what constitutes an annexation sufficient for this purpose. It is a question which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating the intention, viz the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation. When the article in question is no further attached to the land than by its own weight, it is generally to be considered a mere chattel; as was the case in Wiltshire v Cottrel<sup>99</sup>. However, even in such a case if the intention is apparent to make the articles part of the land, they do become part of the land as was the case in D'Eyncourt v Gregory:<sup>1</sup>

Thus, blocks of stone placed one on top of another without any mortar or cement for the purpose of forming a dry stone wall would become part of the land, though the same stones if deposited in a builder's yard and for convenience sake stacked on the top of each other in the form of a wall, would remain chattels. On the other hand, an article may be firmly fixed to the land, and yet the circumstances may be such as to show that it was never intended to be a part of the land, then it does not become part of the land. The anchor of a large ship must be very firmly fixed to the ground in order to bear the strain of the cable, yet no one could suppose that it became part of the land, even though it should chance that the ship owner was also the owner of the fee of the spot where the anchor was dropped. An anchor similarly fixed in the soil for the purpose of bearing the strain of the chain of a suspension bridge would be part of the land.

Perhaps the true rule is, that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended, lies on those who assert they have ceased to be chattels, and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land even slightly is to be considered as part of the land unless the circumstances are such as to show that it was intended all along to continue as a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel.

The two tests, therefore, are:

- (1) the degree or mode of annexation; and
- (2) the object of annexation.

(20) Mode of Annexation, English Law

In Wake v Halt<sup>2</sup> Lord Blackburn said:

The degree and nature of the annexation is an important element for consideration; for where a chattel is so annexed that it cannot be removed without great damage to the land, it affords a strong ground for thinking that it was intended to be annexed in perpetuity to the land; and as Lord Hardwicke said in Lawton v Lawton<sup>3</sup>:

You shall not destroy the principal thing by taking away the accessory to it. Thus looms attached to the floor and to the beams of a mill,<sup>4</sup> or tip up seats fastened to the floor of a cinema,<sup>5</sup> or advertisement hoardings firmly imbedded in the earth have been held to be part of the land.<sup>6</sup> But cisterns merely standing by their own weight,<sup>7</sup> or brewer's vats resting on brick-work and timber,<sup>8</sup> or tapestries which can be removed without structural injury to the house,<sup>9</sup> or green houses merely resting on the soil,<sup>10</sup> have been held to be chattels.

(21) Object of Annexation, English Law

The object of annexation is the more important consideration.<sup>11</sup> This is a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances in each case, an important element being the nature of the interest in the land possessed by the person who causes the annexation. Thus, if a tenant for years or a tenant for life fixes tapestry to a wall, it may readily be inferred that he did not intend them to become fixture,<sup>12</sup> though the circumstances may show that he did so intend.<sup>13</sup> Such an intention is more readily inferred in the case of a tenant in fee simple.<sup>14</sup> Articles which may be removed without structural damage and even articles merely resting by their own weight are fixtures, if they are added with the intention of permanently improving the premises. A gas engine fastened by bolts and nuts to a concrete floor by a tenant in fee simple subject to a mortgage,<sup>15</sup> and looms in a mill fastened to beams,<sup>16</sup> and machinery fastened by bolts and nuts to concrete beds have been held to be fixtures belonging to a mortgagee.<sup>17</sup> Looms in a mill fastened to the floor pass under an assignment of fixed machinery.<sup>18</sup>

(22) The same Tests in Indian Law

The same two tests as to mode of annexation and object of annexation have been applied in India. In a case under the Registration Act, Jenkins CJ held that machinery was not immovable property, as it had been erected by a monthly tenant.<sup>19</sup> If the lease contemplates the removal of machinery, it cannot be regarded as having been permanently fixed.<sup>20</sup> Greater stress is, however, laid on the mode of annexation. In Chaturbhuj v Bennet,<sup>21</sup> the court said that for qualifying as fixture it must be attached to the earth as that expression is defined in s 3 of the TP Act. A hut is immovable property,<sup>22</sup> even if it is sold with an option to pull it down.<sup>23</sup> A mortgage of the superstructure of a house though expressed to be exclusive of the land beneath, creates an interest in immovable property,<sup>24</sup> as it is permanently attached to the ground on which it is built. Similarly, oil and flour mills and the machinery used in working them, are fixtures.<sup>25</sup> In another case,<sup>26</sup> it has been held that the test is whether the annexation is with the object of the permanent beneficial enjoyment of the land or building; so, machinery for metal-shaping and electro-plating which was attached by bolts to special concrete bases and could not be easily moved, was held not to be a part of the structure housing it, or the soil beneath it. The court held that the machinery was not attached for the more beneficial enjoyment of either the soil, or the concrete; it was actually a case of the structure being built around the machinery to protect it. A corrugated iron shed which rested by its own weight on the foundation prepared, was held to be a chattel which may be removed by a lessee.<sup>27</sup>

(23) Trade Fixtures

With a view to encourage trade, English law<sup>28</sup> allows relaxation of the rules with reference to trade fixtures. These are regarded as accessory to the business, and not as an annexation to the premises. Thus, soap boiling vats,<sup>29</sup> engines for working collieries,<sup>30</sup> and machinery and buildings erected on a colliery by miners working under a local custom<sup>31</sup> are not fixtures. Similarly, in India, distillery vats in a house have been held to be movables, as they are for trade purposes, and not for the beneficial enjoyment of the house.<sup>32</sup> However, this principle has no application where the articles are affixed by persons who are themselves owners of the land.<sup>33</sup>

(24) Hire Purchase Agreement

The existence of a hire purchase agreement does not affect the question of the intention of the annexation.<sup>34</sup> This has been decided in cases where the contest was between the mortgagee of the premises, and the person who had hired the machine to the mortgagor.

Illustration

A gas engine was let out on the hire-purchase system under an agreement in writing which provided that it should not become the property of the hirer until the payment of all the instalments, and should be removable by the owner on the failure of the hirer to pay any instalment. The engine was affixed to the land of the hirer by bolts and screws to prevent it from rocking, and was used by him for the purposes of his trade. Default having been made in the payment of the instalments, the engine was claimed by the owner, and also by a mortgagee of the land, who took his mortgage after the hiring agreement and without notice of it, and had entered into possession while the engine was still on the land. It was held that the engine was sufficiently annexed to the land to become a fixture, and that any intention to be inferred from the terms of the hiring agreement that it should remain a chattel, did not prevent it from becoming a fixture; and consequently it passed to the mortgagee as part of the freehold.<sup>35</sup>

(25) Attached to what is so Embedded

The attachment must be, as the section says for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached. Thus, the doors, windows and shutters of a house are attached to the house, which is embedded in the earth, for the beneficial enjoyment of the house. They form part of the house, and have no separate existence.<sup>36</sup> Similar is the case with the movable parts of fixed machinery. However, if the attachment is not intended to be permanent, the articles attached do not form part of the house, eg window blinds and sashes,<sup>37</sup> and ornamental articles such as glasses and tapestry fixed by a tenant for life.<sup>38</sup>

A curious case is reported in the Solicitors Journal,<sup>39</sup> where a hired machine which rested by its own weight on the floor was driven by an engine, which was a fixture embedded in the earth. The machine could be lifted and bodily taken away, but it was claimed that it was a fixture because it was attached to the engine. Eve J however, repelled this contention and said:

With regard to the indirect attachment to the motive power, if I were to hold that that constituted a fixture, then every motive power would be a connection which would change a chattel into a fixture.

The same conclusion would be arrived at under this section, for the machine is not attached for the beneficial enjoyment of the engine, and it is the engine that is subordinate to the machine. If a thing is embedded in the earth or attached to what is so embedded, for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached, then it is part of the immovable property. Where the attachment is merely for the beneficial enjoyment of the chattel itself, then it remains a chattel, even though fixed for the time being so that it may be enjoyed. The question in each case is to be decided according to the circumstances. In one case, an oil engine as part of a cinema on the premises leased, was held not to be immovable property.<sup>40</sup>

The machinery of a cotton baling press which was placed in a building to shelter it from the weather, is movable property,<sup>41</sup> as although the building is embedded in the earth, the machinery was not put there for the beneficial enjoyment of the building.

(26) Actionable Claim

The definition of actionable claim was originally contained in s 130. The chapter on actionable claims was remodelled by Act 2 of 1900, and the definition was amended and inserted in this section. The definition is explained in the notes to s 130.

In India, copyright which is chose in action in England, is a beneficial interest in the movable property in the actual or constructive possession of the owner thereof, although strictly not an actionable claim, but capable of being transferred by assignment evidenced by a writing executed by the assignor or by his duly authorised agent.<sup>42</sup>

(27) Notice

The equitable doctrine of notice which controls unconscionable transactions is recognised in various sections of TP Act. For instance, in s 39, if a transfer is made of property out of which a person has a right to receive maintenance, the transferee takes subject to that right if he had notice of it, but not otherwise. Similarly in s 40, if A conveys to C property which he had by a previous contract agreed to sell to B, then B can enforce the contract against C, if C had notice of it, but not otherwise. If C had notice of the prior contract, he purchases with knowledge that it was unconscionable of A to sell to him, and it is, therefore, unconscionable of him to buy. To the same effect is the second illustration to cl (b) of s 27 of the Specific Relief Act 1872,<sup>43</sup> and s 91 of the Trusts Act 1882.

Notice may be either express or constructive, while notice to an agent is sometimes called imputed notice in so far as it affects the principal.

(28) Express Notice

Express notice, or actual notice is notice whereby a person acquires actual knowledge of the fact. It must be definite information given in the course of negotiations by a person interested in the property, as a person is not bound to attend to vague rumours or statements by strangers.<sup>44</sup> Notice must be given in the same transaction, as notice given in a previous transaction may have been forgotten.<sup>45</sup> Mere casual conversation is not enough, and in Lloyd v Banks,<sup>46</sup> Lord Cairns said that an encumbrancer who alleges that a trustee has notice of his encumbrance must prove 'that the mind of the trustees has in some way been brought to an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the encumbrance which has come upon the property, so that a reasonable man, or an ordinary man of business, would act upon the information and would regulate his conduct by it.' A mere statement either in court, or somewhere else, that some person claims title, is not sufficient notice to an auction purchaser of a deed, if it is not disclosed at the auction sale.<sup>47</sup> However, when such an assertion is made to the intending purchaser, it is sufficient to put him to further inquiry as to the interest or title claimed,<sup>48</sup> and so, it would amount to constructive notice of facts which such enquiry would have disclosed.<sup>49</sup>

(29) Constructive Notice

Constructive notice is the equity which treats a man who ought to have known a fact, as if he actually does know it. A well-known case on the subject is Jones v Smith<sup>50</sup> where the following classic passage occurs in the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram:

It is, indeed, scarcely possible to declare a priori what shall be deemed constructive notice, because, unquestionably, that which would not affect one man may be abundantly sufficient to affect another. But I believe, I may, with sufficient accuracy for my present purpose and without danger assert that the cases in which constructive notice has been established resolve themselves into two classes;

first, cases in which the party charged has had actual notice that the property in dispute was in fact charged, encumbered or in some way affected, and the court has thereupon bound him with constructive notice of facts and instruments, to a knowledge of which he would have been led by an enquiry after the charge, encumbrance or other circumstances affecting the property of which he had actual notice; and secondly, cases in which the court has been satisfied from the evidence before it that the party charged had designedly abstained from enquiry for the very purpose of avoiding notice....

The proposition of law, upon which the former class of cases proceeds, is not that the party charged had notice of a fact or instrument, which in truth related to the subject in dispute without his knowing that such was the case, but that he had actual notice that it did so relate. The proposition of law, upon which the second class of cases proceed, is not that the party charged had inadvertently neglected to make inquiries, but that he had designedly abstained from such inquiries for the purpose of avoiding knowledge--a purpose, which if proved, would clearly show that he had a suspicion of the truth and a fraudulent determination not to learn it. Therefore, where there is no actual notice that the property is in some way affected, and no fraudulent turning away from a knowledge of facts which the res gestae would suggest to a prudent mind; if mere want of caution as distinguished from fraudulent and wilful blindness is all that can be imputed to the purchaser--there, the doctrine of constructive notice will not apply; there, the purchaser will in equity be considered, as in fact he is, a bona fide purchaser, without notice.

However, courts of equity had extended the doctrine from cases of fraudulent turning away to cases of gross negligence, and in a later case,<sup>51</sup> Wigram VC stated that there might be a degree of negligence so gross (crassa negligentia) that a court of justice might treat it as evidence of fraud, although morally speaking the party charged might be perfectly innocent. In truth, fraud and negligence are mutually exclusive conceptions, but courts of equity extended their jurisdiction from fraud to negligence and included gross negligence in the doctrine of constructive notice. In this respect the section follows the English law.

The courts have, however, been reluctant to extend the doctrine to cases where there is no real negligence, as the doctrine results in the imputation of knowledge to the person who does not in fact often possess it.<sup>52</sup>

Constructive notice has been said to arise from an irrebuttable presumption of notice. In Plumb v Fluit,<sup>53</sup> Eyre, CB said:

Constructive notice I take to be in its nature no more than evidence of notice, the presumptions of which are so violent that the court will not allow even of its being controverted.

Such a presumption, which is said to be irrebuttable,<sup>54</sup> can arise only in a case in which the party seeking the benefit of that doctrine has acted innocently. The doctrine of constructive notice will not be applied where the party seeking the benefit of that doctrine has been guilty of secrecy or fraud in the transaction with constructive notice of which he seeks to affect a purchaser; and, therefore, a vendor who is bound to disclose an encumbrance cannot plead that the purchaser had constructive notice of it.<sup>55</sup> A decree-holder bringing his judgment debtor's property to sale cannot set up a mortgage to himself which he has not disclosed, and plead that its registration was constructive notice to the purchaser.<sup>56</sup> The doctrine of constructive notice may be applied as against government.<sup>57</sup>

This legal presumption of knowledge arises from--

- (a) Wilful abstention from an inquiry or search.
- (b) Gross negligence.
- (c) Registration
- (d) Actual possession
- (e) Notice to an agent

(30) Wilful Abstention from an Inquiry or Search

These words recall the expression used by Wigrani, VC in his judgment in Jones v Smith.<sup>58</sup> In the corresponding s 3 of the Enclign Conveyancing Act 1882, now replaced by s 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925, the words are: 'If such enquiries and inspection had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him.' With reference to the duty of a purchaser to investigate title, Lord Selborne, in Agra Bank v Barry,<sup>59</sup> said:

But this, if it can properly be called duty, is not a duty owing to the possible holder of a latent title or security. It is merely the course which a man dealing bona fide in the proper and usual manner for his own interest, ought, by himself or his solicitor, to follow with a view to his own title and security. If he does not follow that course, the omission of it may be a thing requiring to be accounted for or explained. It may be evidence, if it is not explained, or a design inconsistent with bona fide dealing, to avoid knowledge of the true state of the title.

The Calcutta High Court following this case have construed the words 'wilful abstention from an enquiry or search' to mean such abstention as would show lack of bona fides.<sup>60</sup> Thus, a person refusing a registered letter cannot afterwards plead ignorance of its contents.<sup>61</sup> The principle that means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge, has been applied to a banker's passbook so as to fix a customer with knowledge and ratification of entries therein.<sup>62</sup> Where a purchaser omits to inspect title deeds, he may be affected with notice of all facts which he would have discovered upon a proper investigation of title.<sup>63</sup> Similarly, the omission by a purchaser to inspect entries in the Record of Rights will amount to wilful abstention from inquiry under this section.<sup>64</sup> Where a charge was registered, but the agent of a subsequent mortgagee omitted to look into the register of the Registrar, the mortgagee was deemed to have had constructive notice of the charge.<sup>65</sup> However, where a charge was not registered in the Record of Rights, which a purchaser was bound to search, he would not be held to have had constructive notice thereof by his omission to inquire elsewhere, eg, the Mamlatdar's office.<sup>66</sup>

(1) B borrows money from C and deposits with C, by way of equitable mortgage, the sale deed by which he had purchased a property from A. The sale deed recites that part of the purchase money had been retained by B to pay A's debts. B had not paid these debts and C makes no enquiry as to whether he had done so. C has constructive notice of A's lien for unpaid purchase money, and the mortgage is subject to A's lien.<sup>67</sup>

Actual notice of a deed is constructive notice of the contents of the deed, and of all other deeds to which it refers as affecting the same property. Thus, when a deed of sale referred to a partition deed under which the house has fallen to the vendor's share, the purchaser was affected with notice of a right of pre-emption reserved in the deed of partition.<sup>68</sup> Prior to the passing of the Law of Property Act 1925, a person taking a lease had constructive notice of restrictive covenants entered into by the freeholder.<sup>69</sup> A person who agrees to buy a lease has constructive notice of the covenants in the lease, but only if he had an opportunity of inspecting it.<sup>70</sup> The Calcutta High Court, however, has held that a person acquiring a lease by private transfer, should call for the title deed of the vendor, and has constructive notice of a term in the lease providing for a high rate of interest on arrears of rent.<sup>71</sup> Where executors borrowed money on an equitable mortgage of the testator's title deeds, the mortgagee was held to have constructive notice of a charge on the property mortgaged, created by the will under which the executors represented the estate, if he had investigated the title, he would have had notice of the will and its contents.<sup>72</sup> The abstention from inquiry must be designed, as due to a desire to avoid an inquiry which would lead to ultimate knowledge. A mere omission to make enquiries is not sufficient.<sup>73</sup>

(2) S left his house and land to his sons by his first wife and appointed them executors of his will. He left Rs 30,000 to his sons by his second wife, charged on the aforesaid house and land. The sons by the first wife borrowed Rs 52,000 from the bank and deposited the title deeds of the house and land with the bank by way of equitable mortgage to secure the loan. The will was not among the documents of title deposited. When the bank enforced their mortgage and brought the house and land to sale, the sons of the second wife claimed that their charge had precedence. If the bank had made inquiry as to how the mortgagors derived title from S, they would have had cognizance of the will. The bank had therefore constructive notice of the charge, and the claim of the sons by the second wife prevailed over the mortgage.<sup>74</sup>

Where the mortgagors had dealt with the bank as executors, the bank would have been entitled to assume that they were acting for the purpose of administration.<sup>75</sup> However, even in that case the bank would have been affected with notice, if the circumstances of the transaction for instance, the fact that the mortgage was to secure advances to the mortgagors personally) were such as to afford evidence that the executors were committing a breach of trust.<sup>76</sup>

On the other hand, notice to a purchaser by his title papers in one transaction, will not be notice to him in a subsequent and independent transaction in which the instruments containing the recitals are not necessary to his title.<sup>77</sup> This principle was enunciated by Lord Redesdale in Hamilton v Royse,<sup>78</sup> and quoted with approval by Smith MR in Tressilian v Caniffe,<sup>79</sup> as follows:

If a man purchases an estate under a deed, which happens to relate also to other lands not comprised in that purchase, and afterwards purchases the other lands to which an apparent title is made, independent of that deed, the former notice of the deed will not of itself affect him in the second transaction, for he was not bound to carry in his recollection those parts of a deed which had no relation to the particular purchase as was then about, nor to take notice of more of the deed than affected his then purchase.

(3) If B buys two properties X and Y from A, leaves part of the purchase money unpaid and then sells X to C and informs C of A's charge for unpaid purchase money, then C's purchase of X will be subject to A's charge. But if in the following year C also purchases Y from B, and B omits to inform C of A's charge, the information C received when purchasing X will not operate as notice so as to make his purchase of Y subject to A's charge.

There is a well recognised distinction between deeds which must affect the property, and deeds which may or may not affect it. Omission to inspect a deed which necessarily affects title and forms a link in the chain of title involves constructive notice, and a purchaser will not be excused even if the vendor has expressly stated that the deed contains nothing affecting title.<sup>80</sup> However, a purchaser is not presumed to know instruments which are neither directly, nor presumptively connected with the title and may only by possibility affect it.<sup>81</sup> Where the deed does not necessarily affect the property, and the purchaser is informed about the same, he may rely on such an assurance.<sup>82</sup> In Jones v Smith,<sup>83</sup> the intending mortgagee inquired of the mortgagor and his wife if any settlement had been made on their marriage, and was told that a settlement had been made which did not include the husband's property.; the mortgagee accepted his assurance and was not affected with notice that the property mortgaged was infact included in the marriage settlement.

Generally speaking, constructive notice will not be inferred, unless some specific circumstance can be shown as a starting point of an inquiry which if prosecuted, would have led to the discovery of the fact.<sup>84</sup> If the purchaser is informed that there are charges, he will be affected with notice of all charges which he could have ascertained on inquiry.<sup>85</sup> If the purchaser knows that rents are paid to some person other than the vendor, he will be affected with notice of that person's right.<sup>86</sup> Where the purchaser has knowledge that the deeds of the title are in the possession of a third party, he has constructive notice of the same. If the mortgagor says that the deeds are in the possession of the bank for safe custody, and the mortgagee makes no further inquiry of the bank, he will be affected with notice of the pledge, if the deeds prove to be pledged to the bank.<sup>87</sup>

(4) A borrows Rs 7,000 from B on an equitable mortgage of 10 bighas of land and deposits the original title deeds with B. A then sells two bighas of the said land to C for Rs 4,700 and gives a copy of the title deeds to C for inspection, C asked for the original deeds and A said that he had not got them but promised to show them in a few days. A failed to do so and C made no further inquiry. C is affected with constructive notice of the equitable mortgage.<sup>88</sup>

(31) Gross Negligence

Mere negligence or 'want of caution', to quote the phrase used by Wigram VC in Jones v Smith,<sup>89</sup> is not penalised with constructive notice. The phrase 'gross negligence' was invented by the courts of equity in order to extend their jurisdiction. Equity cannot interfere with the legal title, except in cases of trusts, fraud or accident. Negligence is not fraud, as negligence implies indolence and indifference, while fraud is active dishonesty. However, in extreme cases, courts of equity over came the difficulty by assuming that the negligent person had wilfully shut his eyes to circumstances which called for inquiry. On this assumption, gross negligence was evidence of a fraudulent design which gave the Court of Equity jurisdiction to interfere.<sup>90</sup>

Wigram VC has said that gross negligence is:

a degree of negligence so gross (crassa negligencia) that a Court of Justice may treat it as evidence of fraud -- impute a fraudulent motive to it -- and visit it with the consequences of fraud, although (morally speaking) the party charged may be perfectly innocent.<sup>91</sup>

Similarly, in Ware v Lord Egmont<sup>92</sup> Lord Cranworth said:

The question, when it is sought to affect a purchaser with constructive notice, is not whether he had the means of obtaining, and might by prudent caution have obtained, the knowledge in question, but whether not obtaining it was an act of gross or culpable negligence.

In more modern times, the courts in England have departed from the doctrine thus laid down in the earlier equity cases in two respects. First, the adjectives 'gross' and 'culpable' as applied to negligence have been subjected to considerable criticism. Lord Cranworth himself said in the later case of Colyer v Finch.<sup>93</sup>

Cases are very difficult to deal with when you are obliged to use vituperative epithets of that sort in order to enunciate a principle.

In Wilson v Breit<sup>94</sup> the same learned judge said that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet. Romer J in Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Company<sup>95</sup> explained that the real distinction between gross negligence and ordinary negligence lies in the difference between the extent of duty to take care imposed in each case. Secondly, the equitable doctrine that gross negligence is negligence which amounts to fraud has also been departed from. It was criticised by Fry LJ in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co v Whipp<sup>96</sup> as involving an inconsistency, fraud 'leads men to do or omit doing a thing not carelessly but for a purpose.' Negligence does not import the existence of a duty to the public, as Fry LJ said in the case last cited, title deeds are not analogous to ferocious dogs which the owner is under a general duty to keep in safe custody. Lord Cranworth had said in Colyer v Finch<sup>97</sup> that 'what constitutes gross negligence is always excessively difficult either to define, or by way of anticipation to illustrate.' In Dixon v Muckleslon,<sup>98</sup> Lord Selborne referred gross negligence to the doctrine of estoppel:

But it must be something, which raises a positive equity against him, upon the principle which in equity, as distinct from law, is conveniently designated by the term 'estoppel'. In other words, the man who has conducted himself in such a manner is not entitled to deny the truth of his own representations if it be a case of express representation--he is not entitled to deny being bound by the natural consequences of his own acts, if it be a case of positive acts--he is not entitled to refuse to abide by the consequence of his own wilful and unjustifiable neglect, if that is the nature of the case. By one or other of those means, he may have armed another person with the power of going into the world under false colours; and if it be really and truly the case that by his act, or his improper omissions, such an apparent authority and power has been vested in that other person, he is bound upon equitable principles by the use made of that apparent authority and power.

This is a correct statement of the principle and the rule that is followed in England with reference to the postponement of legal mortgages laid down by Lord Lindley in Oliver v Hinton<sup>99</sup> that:

to deprive a purchaser for value without notice of a prior encumbrance of the protection of the legal estate, it is not in my opinion essential that he should have been guilty of fraud; it is sufficient that he has been guilty of such gross negligence as would render it unjust to deprive the prior encumbrancer of his priority.

This case was followed by the Calcutta High Court in Lloyds Bank Ltd v P F Guzdar & Co<sup>1</sup> dissenting from the dictum of Jenkins J in Monindra v Troylucko Nath<sup>2</sup> that 'gross neglect' in s 78 of TP Act means neglect that amounts to evidence of fraud.

Cases of gross negligence which stop a man from denying that he had notice of a fact generally, also fall under the heading 'Wilful abstention from an inquiry or search' or under 'Registration.' Thus, if a purchaser is informed that the deeds of title are in the possession of a bank for safe custody and he omits to make further inquiry of the bank, that is gross negligence which will affect him with notice if the deeds prove to be pledged with the bank.<sup>3</sup> The Privy Council has said that omission to search the register kept under the Registration Act may amount to gross negligence, so as to attract the consequences which result from notice.<sup>4</sup> This ruling has been applied to an omission to search the Revenue Register.<sup>5</sup> Omission to inspect the title of property which a purchaser has contracted to buy, may amount to gross negligence,<sup>6</sup> but not the omission to inspect the title of an adjoining property which prima facie the vendor is under no obligation to produce.<sup>7</sup>

A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court had held in Nawal Kishore v Agra Municipality,<sup>8</sup> approving Ramjilal v Municipal Board, Lucknow<sup>9</sup> and disapproving Municipal Board v Roop Chand Jain<sup>10</sup> that a person buying property in a municipal area must be deemed to be aware that municipal taxes are a charge on the property, that there is a possibility of such taxes being in arrears, and that it is his duty to inquire about such arrears; if he fails to do so, he would be deemed to have notice of such taxes. A similar view was also taken by the Calcutta High Court.<sup>11</sup> In Ahmedabad Municipality v Haji Abdul,<sup>12</sup> the Supreme Court has disapproved of Nawal Kishore's case, and held that no such general rule of law can be laid down; and, whether it was the duty of the transferee to inquire about such arrears must be judged on the facts of each case.

G deposited title-deeds of his house in Calcutta with bank N to secure an overdraft in his account. Subsequently, G represented to the bank that he wished to sell his house in order to clear his overdraft. According to the usual practice, the bank should have delivered the title-deeds to their solicitor in order to arrange for their inspection by the solicitor of the prospective purchaser. But G represented that if the prospective purchaser knew that the deeds were pledged, he would beat him down in price and ask for the deeds to be returned to him. Bank N complied and departing from the usual practice, returned the deeds to G. G then mortgaged the house to another bank L. Bank N was guilty of gross negligence which enabled G to induce bank L to advance money on the house as if it was unencumbered. The mortgage of bank N was postponed to the mortgage of bank L.<sup>13</sup>

Sale of part of property--

Under the proviso to s 55(3), on selling part of the property, the seller is entitled to retain all the documents of title. Having regard to this provision, the purchaser of a part would not be held guilty of negligence in allowing the title-deeds to remain with the seller. It would, however, be prudent of a purchaser of a part, not getting the deeds, to stipulate that he should be allowed to endorse notice, of the sale on the deeds retained by the seller. Since registration is constructive notice, the risk to the purchaser is slight, but in the absence of a statutory provision making it compulsory to endorse notice of sale of part of the property on the documents retained, there is scope for the seller committing fraud on a third party, eg by depositing title-deeds with intent to create security thereon.

(32) Registration as Notice--Explanation I

Explanation I supersedes the former case law as to whether registration of a document under the Registration Act is constructive notice of its contents. The Bombay and Allahabad High Courts had held that registration is notice.<sup>14</sup> The Madras High Court had held that registration is not notice on the ground that if the legislature had so intended, it would have said so.<sup>15</sup> The Calcutta High Court in some cases took the same view as Madras High Court;<sup>16</sup> but the prevailing view in Calcutta High Court was that whether registration operates as notice depends upon the circumstances of each case, ie, whether the omission to search the register taken with the facts of the case would amount to gross negligence so as to attract the consequences which result from notice.<sup>17</sup> The Privy Council in Tilakdhari Lal v Khedan Lal<sup>18</sup> reviewed all the Indian decisions, and approved of the decision of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Monindra v Troylucko Nath<sup>19</sup> that the question was not one of law, but of fact to be determined according to the circumstances of each case. Their Lordships stated that they were impressed with the view that though registration had been held for two centuries not to operate as notice in England, yet the legislature, when framing different Registration Acts and the definition of notice in the TP Act, had omitted to enact the principle that registration is notice. This omission has now been supplied. The definite rule now enacted, the effect of which is to oblige all purchasers to exercise diligence in examining titles recorded in the register, avoids the uncertainty and the risk of perjury involved in taking parole evidence as to whether the omission to search the register should in any particular case be attributed to gross negligence. It also fulfils the chief object of registration, which is to provide a record on which every person dealing with property can rely for a full and complete account of all transactions by which his title may be affected.<sup>20</sup> The Supreme Court has set at rest all controversies by holding that registered deed is a constructive notice, and is a deemed notice under s 3 of the TP Act. It was further held that notice is actual as well as constructive, and a plea of bona fide purchaser without notice is not permissible.<sup>21</sup> Any person who wants to deal with an immovable property is deemed to have knowledge of all duly registered instruments relating to the said immovable property.<sup>22</sup>

In Punjab where the TP Act was not in force, it has been held that the question whether registration operates as notice depends upon the facts of each case.<sup>23</sup> Where a document is not compulsorily registrable, its registration does not amount to constructive notice.<sup>24</sup> Testamentary documents do not come within the purview of notice as contemplated by s 3, exchn 1. They are not required to be registered.<sup>25</sup>

(33) Any Person Acquiring

These words indicate that registration is notice to transferees subsequent to the registration,<sup>26</sup> while the registration of a subsequent transaction is not notice to prior transferees.<sup>27</sup>

In a case decided by Allahabad High Court,<sup>28</sup> Sir John Edge said that any reasonably prudent man who was bringing a suit on a mortgage ought to search the registry in order to ascertain what were the dealings with the property, whether the dealings were anterior to, or subsequent to his mortgage. This observation goes too far, and it can only have reference to the joinder of parties to the suit. Subsequent encumbrances cannot affect a title that has been vested. A prior mortgagee ought to join a subsequent encumbrancer in a suit for sale; but if he does not do so, the result is that the decree is not binding on the encumbrancer.<sup>29</sup>

The registration of a puisne mortgage is not notice to a prior mortgagee.<sup>30</sup> Nor is registration of a sub-mortgage notice to the mortgagor.<sup>31</sup>

Illustration

A mortgages property to B who grants a sub-mortgage to C. A in ignorance of the sub-mortgage, pays the mortgage debt to B. The fact that the sub-mortgage is registered does not amount to notice of the sub-mortgage to A so as to vitiate the payment.<sup>32</sup>

An equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is entitled to priority over a subsequently registered mortgage, as it is a perfected conveyance, and not merely an oral agreement to which s 48 of the Registration Act applies.<sup>33</sup> Express provision is now made in this behalf by a proviso inserted in that section of the Registration Act by amending Act 21 of 1929.

Required by law to be registered

Registration is not notice when there is no duty to search the register. A mortgages his goods to B by a registered mortgage, but retains the goods in his own possession. A then sells the goods to C, who is not aware of the mortgage. C acquires a good title to the goods, the law does not require the registration of mortgages of movables, and there was no duty cast upon him to search the register.<sup>34</sup>

(34) Time from which Registration Operates as Notice

If the instrument has been registered in the same sub-district as that in which the property is situated, it operates as notice from the date of registration. This is because any person seeking to acquire an interest in the property would inspect the register of that sub-district when investigating title. If, however, the property is situated in several sub-districts, or if registration has been effected under s 30(2) of the Registration Act in another district, the registered deed will not operate as notice until memorandum of such registration has been received and filed by the sub-registrar of the sub-district in which the property is situated under s 66 of the Registration Act.<sup>35</sup> The reason for this distinction is that, the purchaser cannot be expected to search the registers of other sub-districts. In Alliance Bank of Simla v Bhai Kahan,<sup>36</sup> a mortgage-deed affecting properties in more than one sub-district was registered at Lahore, and the chief court held that a purchaser of one of the properties in a different district had notice. The court said:

As to the registration of the deed being effected in Lahore, the force of the argument is weakened when it is remembered that, when a deed affecting properties in more than one district is registered in Lahore, a copy is sent for record to each district in which any part of the property is.

The point as to the time from which the registration operated as notice did not arise in this case, but this is now settled by the amendment made in explanation I by amending Act 5 of 1930.

(35) Registration is Notice of Registered Instrument

If an instrument is registered in the manner prescribed by the Registration Act, a party cannot be heard to say that he searched the register without finding it, as he must take the consequences of his want of diligence.<sup>37</sup> Notice of a deed is notice of all material facts affecting the property which appear on the face of the deed, or can be reasonably inferred from its contents.<sup>38</sup> It is also notice of all documents recited in the deed and which an examination of the deed would have disclosed, provided the deed forms part of the chain of title and so necessarily affects the property.<sup>39</sup> Where a mortgage is mentioned in a conveyance, the purchaser has constructive notice of other encumbrances referred to in the mortgage. The report of a very old case-- Bisco v Earl of Banbury<sup>40</sup> contains the following passage:

But my Lord Chancellor declared; that there was sufficient notice in law, or an implied notice, for the mortgage to Hewet was excepted in the Defendant's Conveyance, and therefore they could not be ignorant of the Mortgage, and ought to have seen that, and that would have led them to the other Deeds in which, pursued from one to another, the whole case must have been discovered to them.

The High Court of Punjab and Haryana has held that this explanation has no relevance regarding the period of limitation, and does not state that the period starts only from the time when the person concerned came to know of the sale-deeds. The explanation deals with notice of the previous sale to the subsequent purchaser, and has no concern with limitation for pre-emption suits.<sup>41</sup>

Illustration

A and his half brother B, effected a partition of the family property, and the deed of partition contained a mutual covenant that if either brother agreed to sell his share of the family house, he would give the other a right of pre-emption. B sold his half share of the house to C by a deed which described the share as acquired under a deed of partition. C had constructive notice of the covenant of pre-emption.<sup>42</sup>

The Bombay High Court had in some cases held that registration did not operate as notice of unregistered instruments referred to in the registered deed.<sup>43</sup> These cases, are no longer good law.

(36) Provisos to Explanation I

The provisos to explanation I are self-explanatory. The first proviso merely repeats what is enacted in the fifth paragraph of the section, that registration must be according to law. The second and third provisos make it clear that a purchaser will not be affected with notice of any fact which has not been correctly entered in the registers and indexes kept by the sub-registrar. In Gordhandas v Mohunlal,<sup>44</sup> the Bombay High Court held that the purchaser was not affected with notice of a registered agreement restricting the use of the property purchased because it was not shown that the agreement was indexed in relation to the property sold.

A mere defect of procedure will not invalidate registration.<sup>45</sup> Cases have occurred in which immovable property which ought to be registered in Book No 1 has been registered in the Miscellaneous Register Book No 4. There is a conflict of decisions as to whether such registration is valid,<sup>46</sup> or invalid.<sup>47</sup> However that may be, the second proviso shows that such misplaced entries will not operate as notice.<sup>48</sup>

(37) Record of Rights

Omission by a purchaser to inspect entries in the record of rights will, as already stated above, amount to wilful abstention from inquiry under the first part of the definition of notice.<sup>49</sup>

(38) Actual Possession as Notice of Title--Explanation II

Explanation II settles the law that actual possession is notice of such title as the person in actual possession has. It raises a statutory presumption of 'notice' against any person who acquires any immovable property or any interest therein of the title, if any, of the person who is for the time being in actual possession thereof.<sup>50</sup>

In RK Mohammed Ubaidullah v Hajee C Abdul Wahab,<sup>51</sup> the Supreme Court has held:

With reference to subsequent purchaser it is essential that he should make an inquiry as to the title or interest of the person in actual possession as on the date when the sale transaction was made in his favour. The actual possession of a person itself is deemed or constructive notice of the title if any, of a person who is for the time being in actual possession therof. A subsequent purchaser has to make inquiry as to further interest, nature of possession and title under which the person was continuing in possession on the date of purchase of the property.

In Barnhart v Greenshields,<sup>52</sup> Lord Kingsdown delivering the judgment of the Board said:

With respect to the effect of possession merely, we take the law to be, that if there be a tenant in possession of land, a purchaser is bound by all the equities which the tenant could enforce against the vendor, and that the equity of the tenant extends not only to interests connected with his tenancy, as in Taylor v Stibbert,<sup>53</sup> but also to interests under collateral agreements, as in Daniels v Davison<sup>54</sup> and Alien v Anthony,<sup>55</sup> the principle being the same in both classes of cases; namely, that the possession of the tenant is notice that he has some interest in the land, and that a purchaser having notice of that fact is bound, according to the ordinary rule, either to inquire what that interest is, or to give effect to it, whatever it may be.

A mortgagor contracted to sell the mortgaged property to the mortgagee who was in possession, and then sold it to a third person. The purchaser having made no inquiries, was held to have had constructive notice of all the equities in favour of the mortgagee.<sup>56</sup> Similarly, in Baburam Bag v Madhav Chandra,<sup>57</sup> Sir Lawrence Jenkins CJ said:

the occupation of the property by a tenant ordinarily affects one who would take a transfer of the property with notice of that tenant's rights, and if he chooses to make no inquiry of the tenant, he cannot claim to be a transferee without notice.

A purchaser,<sup>58</sup> or a permanent lessee<sup>59</sup> of a village, is effected with notice of the rights of cultivating tenants about which he made no inquiry. Where a landlord has released the rent of a tenant, and then subsequently mortgages the property leased, the possession of the tenant is constructive notice of the release, and the mortgagee is not entitled to recover rent.

In another case, the vendor after executing the deed obtained an agreement for reconveyance of the property. Later, he entered into an agreement with the vendee for the release of his rights under the agreement for re-conveyance. The vendee was in possession of the property. Subsequently, a 'purchase' of the vendor's rights (under the agreement for reconveyance) was made by a person who was residing near the property in question. It was held by the Karnataka High Court that the subsequent purchaser would be deemed to have notice of the vendee's rights with reference to the agreement between the vendor and vendee.<sup>60</sup>

Where a landlord has released the rent of a tenant and then mortgages the property leased, the possession of the tenant is constructive notice of the release and the mortgagee is not entitled to recover rent from the tenants; but a release after the mortgage is not binding on the mortgagee.<sup>61</sup> The first part of this proposition rests on the principle that the open possession of a tenant is notice, not only of the terms of the tenancy, but of collateral agreements as well, in the absence of all inquiry by the transferee.<sup>62</sup> Therefore, a notice of a tenant in possession, in the absence of inquiry, also constitutes constructive notice of the right of the tenant to claim part-performance under s 53-A.<sup>63</sup>

It has been held, however, that a notice of tenancy is not notice of the tenant's equitable right to have the tenancy agreement rectified, as although the purchaser was bound to ascertain the terms under which the tenant held the land, he was under no duty to ascertain whether the terms accurately set out the bargain between the parties.<sup>64</sup>

Possession to operate as notice must be actual--

In order to operate as constructive notice, possession must be actual possession.<sup>65</sup> Constructive possession is not notice, and the possession of a tenant is not notice of the title of the lessor,<sup>66</sup> unless the purchaser had learnt that the rent was in fact paid to him in a manner inconsistent with the title of the seller.<sup>67</sup>

Thus, if A contracts to sell land to B, and after B has put his tenant in possession, A sells the land to C, then the possession of B's tenant will not be sufficient to affect C with notice of B's interest.

It does not matter that the party in possession under a contract of sale had previously been in possession as tenant of the vendor, as the purchaser has no right to assume that the former tenant has not subsequently acquired another title.<sup>68</sup> On the other hand, if a purchaser finds his vendor in possession, he is not affected with notice that he is in possession, as tenant of a third party.<sup>69</sup>

- (1) A leased his land on 2 March 1901 to B for seven years. On 1 May 1901, A entered into an agreement with B for the renewal of the lease on the termination of the term. On 11 July, A purported to settle the land with C for seven years from 1 May 1908. C sued to recover possession on the ground that the lease to B had terminated but the court held that C had constructive notice of the agreement as B was in possession and that C was not entitled to possession.<sup>70</sup>
- (2) A leased his land to B, and then in 1875, sold it to him for Rs 75 by an unregistered deed of sale. B, who was originally the tenant, continued in possession as owner. In 1876, A sold the land to C by a registered sale deed. C sued B for the rent alleging that B was in possession as tenant. Although C's deed being registered would have priority over B's unregistered deed, yet C is not entitled to rent because having notice of B's possession he had constructive notice of the title on which B held the land.<sup>71</sup>
- (3) A sells land to B but remains in possession as tenant of B. The sale deed to B is unregistered, and A afterwards sells the same land to C by a registered deed. C is not deprived of the priority by the doctrine of notice, for he had no reason to suppose that A was in possession otherwise than as owner.<sup>72</sup>

Possession only of a portion where whole property sold--

The rule depends upon the principle that when another is in exclusive possession of the property, and such possession would be prima facie inconsistent with the full rights of ownership of the vendor or mortgagor, and the purchaser does not choose to ask what that possession is, he must be taken to have got the information that he would have obtained if he had asked.<sup>73</sup> However, the doctrine must not be extended to the case of every person who may be on the premises; and possession of a small part of a house will not put a purchaser on constructive notice of that person's rights as to the whole house.<sup>74</sup>

The principle of constructive notice cannot be extended to a case where the person who claims on the basis of prior agreement is in possession of only a small fraction of the property. In such a case, it cannot be said that the person who purchases the property must make an inquiry about the previous contract from the plaintiff or any other tenant in occupation of a portion of the house.<sup>75</sup>

(39) State of the Property

A purchaser has been held to have notice of the rights of third parties from the state of the property purchased. Thus, the mortgagee of a burial ground has notice of the purposes to which it is devoted, and is bound by the rights of burial, temporary or in perpetuity, granted by his mortgagor, while left in possession.<sup>76</sup> If there is a shrine or tomb on the land to be sold, the purchaser will be put to an inquiry as to whether the land is a wakf.<sup>77</sup> Where a part of an estate, agreed to be let upon building leases was sold and the purchaser had notice of the existence of an archway, which, on the completion of the buildings was to be the only access to the adjoining land, it was held that the state of the property being such as to put the purchaser upon inquiry, he was fixed with constructive notice of the right of way.<sup>78</sup> However, the mere fact of there being windows in an adjoining house, which overlooked a purchased property, is not constructive notice of an agreement giving a right to the access of light to them, as windows are frequently made in situations where they are liable to be obstructed.<sup>79</sup>

(40) Notice to an Agent

Explanation III amends the law as to notice to an agent. Prior to the amending Act of 1929, the definition of notice included a provision that a person is said to have notice of a fact 'when information of the fact is given or obtained by his agent under the circumstances mentioned in s 229 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.' The words 'given or obtained' suggested express notice. In a case decided by Calcutta High Court<sup>80</sup> Pontifex J said 'for a purchaser to be affected with constructive notice through his solicitor, the latter himself must have actual notice.' The words 'given or obtained' have been omitted, and the reference to the section of the Indian Contract Act deleted, and the definition widened so as to include a fact of which the agent has notice, whether express or constructive. This accords with the principle qui facit per alium facit per se, ie, he who acts through another is deemed to act in person, and that the agent stands in the place of his principal with reference to the business for which he is agent so that his acts and knowledge are the acts and knowledge of his principal.<sup>81</sup>

The expression 'imputed notice' was first used by Lord Chelmsford in the following passage from Espin v Pemberton :82

Constructive notice properly so called, is the knowledge which the courts impute to a person upon a presumption so strong of the existence of the knowledge, that it cannot be allowed to be rebutted, either from his knowing something which ought to have put him upon further inquiry, or from his wilfully abstaining from inquiry, to avoid notice. I should therefore prefer calling the knowledge which a person has either by himself or through his agent, actual knowledge or if it is necessary to make a distinction between the knowledge which a person possesses himself, and that which is known to his agent, the latter might be called imputed knowledge.

The Privy Council has held that it is a rule of law that imputes the knowledge of the agent to the principal, as the agency extends to receiving notice, on behalf of the principal, of whatever is material.<sup>83</sup>

(41) Scope of the Rule as to Imputed Notice

The rule of imputed notice is subject to certain limitations. Notice should have been received by the agent (1) during the agency; (2) in his capacity as agent; (3) in the course of the agency business; (4) in a matter material to the agency business; and (5) should not have been fraudulently withheld from the principal.

The first four conditions are implied by the words 'whilst acting on his behalf in the course of the business to which that fact is material.' The fifth condition is the subject of the proviso and will be considered separately.<sup>84</sup>

During the agency--

It is essential that the knowledge should have been acquired by the agent, as agent and while acting in the agency business. Thus, if a canvasser for an insurance company negotiates a policy of insurance for a man who has lost the sight of one eye, against the loss of both eyes; the knowledge obtained by the canvasser, when acting as agent of the company, that the man had already lost one eye, will be imputed to the company.<sup>85</sup> Knowledge obtained before the commencement of the agency will not be imputed to the principal. A mortgagee is not held to have notice of prior charges because his solicitor had previously acted for the prior encumbrancers.<sup>86</sup> In Chabildas Lalloobhai v Dayai Mowji,<sup>87</sup> a mortgagee sold the property mortgaged under a power of sale, and one of the conditions of the sale was a depreciatory condition wholly unwarranted by the state of the mortgagor's title. The purchaser signed the contract the same day, and a few days later employed a solicitor to act for him in the preparation of a conveyance. The High Court set aside the sale on the ground that the solicitor knew enough about the title to see that the condition was unjustifiable. The Privy Council, however, said that this view imputed to the principal the knowledge of an agent not acquired in the business for which he was agent, and to use it to upset a transaction at the date the agency commenced, was an extension of the doctrine of constructive notice with which the Council could not concur. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that knowledge acquired by an agent after the agency has terminated, cannot be imputed to the principal.

In his capacity as agent--

It is necessary that the transaction should be such as to constitute the relation of principal and agent. It has been held that notice to the agent of a country solicitor is notice to the person employing the solicitor.<sup>88</sup> On the other hand, if a mortgagee allows a mortgagor-solicitor to endorse the deed of mortgage, he does not constitute the solicitor his agent, and is not affected with knowledge of an encumbrance known to him.<sup>89</sup> Where company A lends money to company B, and if a director of company A is by reason of a personal interest in company B aware that the loan is required for an ultra vires purpose, that knowledge will not be imputed to company A, as the director is under no duty to disclose how the money borrowed would be applied.<sup>90</sup> However, if a director in his personal capacity has notice of a charge on shares of the company, that will amount to notice to the company.<sup>91</sup> Similarly, if a director charges his own shares, notice of the charge will be imputed to the company.<sup>92</sup>

In the course of the agency business--

Employment of a solicitor in one transaction will not make him an agent for receiving notice in a subsequent transaction.<sup>93</sup> Where the purchaser employed the same solicitor as the vendor, and the solicitor had heard of certain restrictions in the course of his previous employment by the vendor, notice of the restrictions was not imputed to the purchaser since his solicitor would not have discovered them if he had investigated title in the usual way.<sup>94</sup>

Material to the business--

The knowledge must, of course, be material to the business for which the agent is employed. It is not a part of the duty of an agent to acquire knowledge of a fact which is not material to the business of the agency, nor would it be his duty, if he did acquire such knowledge, to communicate it to his principal.<sup>95</sup>

Ratification--

If a principal ratifies the act of an agent, notice to the agent will be imputed as notice to the principal, as the effect of the ratification is to constitute the agent an agent ab initio.<sup>96</sup>

Communication by agent not necessary--

That the knowledge of the agent is knowledge of the principal has been said by the Privy Council to be a rule of law and an inference of fact.<sup>97</sup> In the absence of fraud, it does not matter that there has been no communication by the agent.<sup>98</sup> In Kettlewell v Watson,<sup>99</sup> Fry LJ said :

The court, therefore, receives evidence of the agency and it receives evidence of the act of the principal, but it will not receive evidence whether the agent recollects the fact at the time, or whether he communicated it to his principal. It deals with those matters by way of irrebuttable presumption when the circumstances are known.

The Privy Council has taken the same view.<sup>1</sup>

(42) Proviso as to Imputed Notice: Fraudulent Concealment of Fact by Agent

Fraud on the part of the agent exempts the principal from the rule of imputed notice. Such conduct raises a necessary presumption that the notice has not been communicated, as a fraudulent person will never communicate it to one of his victims. In Cave v Cave,<sup>2</sup> it is pointed out by Fry LJ that this exception has been based on two grounds:

- (1) that the act done by the agent is such as cannot be said to be done by him in his character of agent, but is done by him in the character of a party to an independent fraud on his principal, and that it is not to be imputed to the principal as an act done by his agent; and
- (2) that circumstances raised the inevitable conclusion that the notice had not been communicated.

In the case already cited,<sup>3</sup> Lord Wrenbury (then Buckley J) said:

I understand the law to be this: that if a communication be made to an agent which it would be his duty to hand on to his principals, and if the agent has an interest which would lead him not to disclose to his principals the information which he has thus obtained, and in point of tact he does not communicate it, you are not to impute to his principals knowledge by reason of the fact that their agent knew something which it was not in his interest to disclose and which he did not disclose.

This passage was cited with approval by the judicial committee in Texas Co Ltd v Bombay Banking Co.<sup>4</sup> In that case, V who was an agent of the bank, had an overdraft in his private banking account which he discharged with money belonging to the Texas Company, who were his principals in an oil business. It was contended that as V was agent of the bank, knowledge of the ownership of the money should be imputed to the bank. However, Lord Buckmaster said:

It would be straining the doctrine of notice beyond all reasonable limits to hold that in such circumstances moneys received in absolute good faith should be earmarked with some independent ownership, because the debtor, who was also a servant of the company committed a fraud in order to discharge his obligations.

Where a party has connived with the agent and information has been fraudulently withheld from the principal by the agent, he cannot take advantage of his fraud and impute notice to the principal. A common solicitor of both parties colluding with one does not affect the other with notice, 'for it would be an encouragement of fraud to apply the rules of notice which were established for the safety of mankind to a transaction like this; it would be sanctioning a scheme to rob a man by colluding with his solicitor'.<sup>5</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A solicitor, CC, who was trustee of a settlement, purchased with the trust money, land in the name of his brother FC. The brother, FC, mortgaged it to a mortgagee who employed CC, as his solicitor. The mortgagee was no party to the fraud and was not affected with the knowledge of the trust which his solicitor possessed.<sup>6</sup>
- (2) A solicitor acts for a husband and wife seeking to mortgage the wife's property, which is in fact caught by a covenant to settle. He also acts for the intending mortgagee. The solicitor, who has notice of the covenant, tells the mortgagors that he will not disclose it to the mortgagee. The mortgagee is not affected with constructive notice of the covenant.<sup>7</sup>

The exception of fraud, however, will not altogether exclude the doctrine of imputed notice, and if the agent is a fraudulent solicitor, notice will be imputed of anything which an honest solicitor, employed in the place of the fraudulent solicitor, would have discovered in the ordinary course of the business of the agency. In Kennedy v Green,<sup>8</sup> a lady was mortgagee of leasehold property belonging to her solicitor who fraudulently obtained her signature to an assignment of the mortgage to himself. He then raised money on a mortgage of the same property as unencumbered leasehold to another client K. The assignment by the lady to the solicitor was drawn in an informal and irregular manner, which would have excited the suspicion of a professional man, and so money was paid to her. It was held that though K could not be deemed to have notice of the fraud of, yet if an independent solicitor had been employed, an examination of the deed signed by the lady would have at once shown the suspicious character of the transaction. K was, therefore, affected with notice that consideration had not been paid, on the ground that the deed and the endorsed receipt thereon, were drawn in a peculiar form. As Lord Brougham LC said:

For Bostock, had he been wholly free from the guilty knowledge and only employed as a solicitor to act for and advice Mr Kirby must on seeing the deed, have had his attention at once called to the suspicious circumstances under which it was executed.'

In this case the fraud was in the obtaining of the deed. There was no attempt to conceal it from K.

Enactments relating to contracts to be taken as part of Contract Act and supplemental to the Registration Act

--The Chapters and sections of this Act which relate to contracts shall be taken as part of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 (9 of 1872).

And section 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123 shall be read as supplemental to the Indian Registration Act 1908 (16 of 1908).

(1) Amendment

The only amendment made by the amending Act 20 of 1929 was to change the year of the Registration Act from 1877 to 1908. However, even before this amendment, the reference to the Registration Act 1877, was by virtue of the General Clauses Act 1907, construed as referring to the Act of 1908.

The second para was added by the amending Act 3 of 1885.

(2) Contract Act

The reference to the Indian Contract Act 1872 is explained by the following passage from the report of the Indian Law Commission on 15 November 1879:

We would declare that all chapters and sections of the bill which relate to contracts should be taken as part of the Contract Act 1872. When the body of substantive civil law for India is arranged in a more compact and convenient form than that of a series of fragmentary portions from time to time passed by the Legislature, the chapters of Sale, Mortgage, Lease and Exchange, contained, in the present Bill, will probably be placed in close connection with the rules contained in the Contract Act. But till then they may fitly be left in a law containing what the Contract Act does not contain, namely, general rules regulating the transmission of property between living persons.

The Indian Succession Act and the Indian Contract Act had been passed before the TP Act, and, as already stated in the notes to the preamble, one of the objects of the TP Act was to bring the rules which regulate the transmission of property between living persons into harmony with the law of testamentary and intestate succession, and to complete the code of contract so far as relates to immovable property.<sup>9</sup> The provisions of TP Act complete the law of contract, as most transfers of property are executed contracts.

In deciding whether a party to a transfer has performed his obligations, the court must consider his obligations under the contract.<sup>10</sup>

Difference between contract and transfer--

The section says that the chapters and sections of TP Act which relate to contracts are to be taken as part of the Indian Contract Act. Thus, the word 'consideration,' wherever it occurs in the TP Act, is used in the same sense as in the Indian Contract Act.<sup>11</sup> Section 137 of TP Act must be read as part of the Indian Contract Act.<sup>12</sup> However, it must be observed that the section does not say that the provisions of the Indian Contract Act are to be read in for the TP Act. There is a clear distinction between a completed conveyance and an executed contract.<sup>13</sup> Therefore, a conveyance or completed transfer cannot be rescinded under s 39 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and a mortgage being a transferee of an interest in property is entitled to enforce his mortgage for the amount he has advanced, although he has failed to advance the whole amount of the mortgage money.<sup>14</sup>

This distinction has been recognised in decisions in Tatia's case, Rashik Lal's case and Dip Narain Singh v Nageshar,<sup>15</sup> approved by the Supreme Court in State of Kerala v Cochin Refineries<sup>16</sup> where the Supreme Court held that a mortgage was valid even though no part of the mortgage-money had been advanced.

(3) Registration Act

The Registration Act 1908 (Registration Act) makes registration optional in the case of immovable property of the value of less than Rs 100. Thus, while under the Registration Act a sale or mortgage for Rs 99 need not be registered, yet under TP Act such a sale (s 54) or mortgage (s 59) may be made either by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property. Similarly, while under the Registration Act, a lease of immovable property other than a lease from year to year, or for a term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent need not be registered, yet under TP Act, such a lease (s 107) may be made either by a registered instrument, or by oral agreement accompanied by the delivery of possession. Similarly, while under the Registration Act a gift of movable property need not be registered, yet under TP Act such gift (s 123) may either be made by a registered instrument, or by delivery. This inconsistency between the Registration Act and the TP Act was noticed by Garth CJ<sup>17</sup> and the intention of the amending Act of 1885 was to remove this difficulty, and to make the provisions of the TP Act as to registration absolute.<sup>18</sup> Thus, although equitable mortgages are recognised in the Punjab, yet when s 59 (prior to its amendment in 1929) was applied to an area in the Punjab, the requisition for registration became absolute and an equitable mortgage could no longer be accepted in that area, if the amount secured was not less than Rs 100.<sup>19</sup>

(4) Supplemental

It will be observed that while parts of the TP Act are to be 'taken as part of the Indian Contract Act' and are thus, incorporated in it, the provision as to the Registration Act is differently expressed, as the specified sections are to be 'read as supplemental to the Registration Act.' It had been held that the effect of the provision as to the Registration Act was merely to add to the list of documents which are compulsorily registrable. It did not go to the length of saying that these supplementary documents were deemed to be included in s 17 of the Registration Act. The provisions of s 49 of the Registration Act, rendering an unregistered document, of which registration is compulsory under s 17, inadmissible as evidence of any transaction affecting such property, were held not to apply to documents in this supplementary list. This was the view taken by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Sohan Lal v Mohan Lal<sup>20</sup> by Macleod CJ in Dawal v Dharma,<sup>21</sup> and by a majority of judges in a decision of full Bench of the Madras High Court.<sup>22</sup> However, this view seems to be over astute, and to attribute to the different expressions used in the two paragraphs of the section a meaning, which was not intended. The difference of language is probably only due to the difference of subject matter. Parts of the TP Act refer to contracts and these parts might be described as to be 'taken as part of the Indian Contract Act'; whereas, a similar expression would not have been appropriate to an extraneous subject like the Registration Act. Those decisions, however, have now been superseded by legislation, as the Act 21 of 1929 by inserting in s 49 of the Registration Act the words 'or by any provision of the Transfer of Property Act 1882,' has made it clear that documents in the supplementary list, ie, documents of which registration is necessary under the TP Act but not under the Registration Act, fall within the scope of s 49, and if not registered are not admissible as evidence of any transaction affecting any property comprised therein, and do not affect any such property.<sup>23</sup>

From a combined reading of s 4 and 54 of the TP Act and, s 17 of the Registration Act, as applicable to the state of Uttar Pradesh, and as amended by Uttar Pradesh Act 57 of 1976, it is clear that every contract of sale of an immovable property shall be made only by a registered instrument.<sup>24</sup>

"Transfer of property" defined

--In the following sections "transfer of property" means an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future, to one or more other living persons, or to himself, or to himself and one or more other living persons; and "to transfer property" is to perform such act.

[In this section "living person" includes a company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individuals.]

(1) Amendment

The section has been amended by the Act of 1929.

(2) Scope

Transfer of Property has been defined in s 5 of the TP Act meaning 'an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future to one or more other living persons and "to transfer property" is to perform such act'.

'Living person' has been defined to include a company or association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall effect any law for the time being in force relating to the transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individuals.<sup>1</sup>

(3) Property

The legislature has not attempted to define the word 'property', but it is used in TP Act in its widest and most generic legal sense.<sup>2</sup> Section 6 says that 'property of any kind may be transferred'. Thus, an actionable claim is property;<sup>3</sup> and so is a right to a reconveyance of land.<sup>4</sup>

Property is not only the thing which is the subject-matter of ownership, but includes also dominium or the right or ownership or of partial ownership, and as Lord Langdale said it is the most comprehensive of all terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have.<sup>5</sup> It is used in this dual sense of the thing and the right of the thing in s 54 which contrasts, 'tangible immovable property' with 'a reversion or other intangible thing'. Property includes rights such as trademarks, copyrights, patents and personal rights capable of transfer or transmission such as debts. In English real property law, the distinction between tangible and intangible things is expressed as corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. A share in the company is a movable property freely alienable in absence of any express restrictions under the articles of association of the company. The shares are, therefore, transferable like any other movable property, and the vendee of the shares cannot be denied the registration of the shares purchased by him on a ground other than stated in the articles.<sup>6</sup>

It has been observed by J Bhagwati in Jugalkishore v Raw Cotton Co<sup>7</sup> that the words 'in present or in future' in s 5 qualify the word 'conveys' and not the word 'property.' A transfer of property not in existence operates as a contract to be performed in the future, which is specifically enforceable as soon as the property comes into existence. Where the operative portion of the sale deed recorded that all rights and privileges in and concerning the property either in present, or accruing in future as vesting in the vendor were the subject matter of the sale, and that the vendor retained no right of any kind, it was held that even the right of the vendor of reconveyance of the property was transferred by the sale deed.<sup>8</sup>

(4) Interests in Property

As ownership consists of a bundle of rights, the various rights and interests may be vested in different persons, eg a mortgagor and a mortgagee, a lessor and a lessee, or a tenant for life and a remainderman. Absolute ownership is an aggregate of component rights such as the right of possession, the right of enjoying the usufruct of the land, and so on.<sup>9</sup>

These subordinate rights, the aggregate of which make up absolute ownership, are referred in the TP Act as interests in property; and in English law, real rights. A transfer of property is either a transfer of absolute ownership, or a transfer of one or more of these subordinate rights. In s 58, however, the word interest is not distinguished from absolute ownership. With reference to an English mortgage it is used to express an absolute interest, ie, ownership which is not the less absolute because it is subject to a covenant to reconvey.

(5) Future Interests in Property: Reversion and Remainder

Some interests in property are future, and are called in English law reversions and remainders. A reversion is the residue of an original estate which is left after the grantor has granted a smaller estate. Thus, the interest of a lessor is a reversion, a future estate pending the termination of a lease. A remainder is an interest granted out of the original estate at the same time as, but in succession to a precedent interest. Thus, if an estate is granted to A for life and then to B, the estate of B is the remainder, and the estate of A is the particular estate which supports it. The terms 'reversion' and 'remainder' are commonly used in judgments of the courts in India. The act uses the word 'reversion' in s 54, but it occurs nowhere else in the TP Act, not even in the chapter dealing with leases. The word 'remainder' does not occur in the TP Act, but in s 13 the phrase 'remaining interest' is used instead. A vested remainder is capable of being attached,<sup>10</sup> and so is a contingent interest.<sup>11</sup>

(6) Legal and Equitable Estates

English law recognizes other interests which are not created by transfer or grant. Thus, in a trust of land the legal estate is in the trustee, and the interest of the cestui que trust or beneficiary is an interest in land called the equitable interest, or equitable estate. Similarly, an agreement for the sale of land leaves the legal estate in the seller, but creates an equitable estate in the buyer.

The law in India recognizes no distinction between legal and equitable estates. The leading case on the subject is Tagore v Tagore,<sup>12</sup> decided by the Privy Council in 1872. In a later case,<sup>13</sup> the Privy Council said:

The law of India, speaking broadly, knows nothing of that distinction between legal and equitable property in the sense in which it was understood when equity was administered by the Court of Chancery in England.

And in a still later case,<sup>14</sup> their Lordships said:

By that law (the law of India), therefore, there can be but one 'owner,' and where the property is vested in a trustee, the 'owner' must, their Lordships think, be the trustee. This is the view embodied in the Indian Trusts Act 1882, ss 3, 55, 56, etc.

The interest of the beneficiary of a trust is defined in s 3 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882 not as an interest in the trust property, but as a right against the trustee as owner of the trust property.

A contract of sale does not, of itself, create any interest in, or charge on, the property. This is expressly declared in s 54 of TP Act, while the fiduciary character of the personal obligation created by a contract for sale is recognised in s 2 of the Specific Relief Act 1963, and in s 91 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882.

The personal obligation created by a contract of sale is described in s 40 as an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of property, but not amounting to an interest or easement therein. The section further enacts that the obligation cannot be enforced against a transferee for consideration without notice. Section 63 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882 similarly enacts that the rights of a beneficiary of a trust cannot be enforced against a transferee in good faith without notice of the trust.

Therefore, these personal rights resemble the equitable estate or interest of the cestui que trust, and of the person who has agreed to purchase in English law, in that they are liable to be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice. The rule against perpetuity which applies to equitable estates in English law has sometimes been applied to these personal rights by way of analogy. This, it is submitted, is a mistake as explained in the notes to s 14.

(7) Transfer

The word 'transfer' is defined with reference to the word 'convey.' This word in English law in its narrower and more usual sense refers to the transfer of an estate in land; but it is sometimes used in a much wider sense to include any form of an assurance inter vivos. The word 'conveys' in s 5 of the TP Act is used in the wider sense referred to above. Transferor must have an interest in the property. He cannot sever himself from it and yet convey it.<sup>15</sup> A lease comes within the meaning of the word 'transfer'.<sup>16</sup> A transfer of property or creation of an interest may be accompanied by conditions, covenants or restraints, unless there is some provision of law which annuls or invalidates such conditions, restraint or limitation.<sup>17</sup>

There is a discernible difference between a case of settlement of property with reservation of a benefit to the settlor on the one hand, and the case where what is settled is only a share or interest or part of the property--excluding the part of the share corresponding to the benefit that the settlor has chosen to retain. In the latter case, there is no transfer at all.<sup>18</sup>

A 'transfer of property' as defined in the present section does not necessarily involve the execution of an instrument of transfer or conveyance. In the case of movables and generally in the case of immovable property of a value of less than Rs 100, a transfer may be effected by delivery of possession. Leases other than leases from year to year or for a time exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent, may be made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The fundamental rule is that a transfer cannot be affected in any way not prescribed by the TP Act.<sup>19</sup>

The definition of transfer of property in this section does not exclude property situated outside India or the territories to which the TP Act applies. It does not matter that the property is situated outside India, or in the territories where the TP Act does not apply;<sup>20</sup> for if the transfer is effected where the TP Act is in force, the rights of the parties are to be determined by the court under the TP Act leaving it to the party affected to prove that by the lex rei sitae, ie, by the law of the land where the property is situated, the transaction is invalid or defective.<sup>21</sup>

If legislative intent of an enactment is to give an extended meaning to the expression transfer, it need not be confined to the statutory concept of transfer under s 5 of the TP Act. Section 71-A of the Chhotanagpur Tenancy Act contemplated that where possession has passed from one to another and as a physical fact the member of the scheduled tribe who is entitled to hold possession has lost it and a non-member has come into possession, would be covered by transfer. The Supreme Court held that it was not proper to confine the meaning of transfer in s 71-A to transfer as defined in s 5 of the TP Act.<sup>22</sup>

Auction Sale--

S 5 does not apply in respect of the property sold in auction sale.<sup>23</sup>

Charge--

A charge is not a transfer of property, for in a charge no right in rem is transferred, but a personal obligation is created -- a jus ad rem or a right to payment out of the property specified.<sup>24</sup> In the Insolvency Acts, a transfer of property is, however, defined as including a charge.<sup>25</sup> That definition is wider because any obligation incurred by a debtor affecting his property may be voidable as a fraudulent preference.<sup>26</sup>

Compromise--

A compromise of doubtful rights is not a transfer, but is based on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties which the agreement acknowledged and defined.<sup>27</sup> The position would be different if such a compromise also transferred properties to a person who has neither a pre-existing title, nor a claim to such title.<sup>28</sup>

Deed of Appointment--

A transfer is not necessarily contractual, and included a deed of appointment.<sup>29</sup> The section does not require that the 'living person' who conveys should necessarily be the same person as he who owns, or owned, the property conveyed.

All that is required is that there should be an act of conveyance by some living person; under the section, there may be a transfer by a person exercising powers over the property of another. Thus, where the donee of a power of appointment, having power to appoint a beneficial interest in the property, exercises that power, it would amount to a transfer.<sup>30</sup>

Easement--

The creation of an easement does not involve a transfer.<sup>31</sup>

Exchange--

An exchange is a mutual transfer of the ownership of one thing for another.<sup>32</sup>

Family Arrangement--

It has been held by the Supreme Court that a family arrangement, like a compromise, is 'based on the assumption that there is an antecedent title of some sort in the parties and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is, each party relinquishing all claims to property other than that falling to his share and recognising the right of the others, as they had previously asserted it, to the portions allotted to them respectively'.<sup>33</sup> It is not necessary that every party taking a benefit under such a settlement must be shown to have, under the law, a share in the property; it is enough if they have a possible claim or even, if they are related, a semblance of a claim.<sup>34</sup> If, however, there is no real dispute or claim at all, the transaction might amount to a transfer.<sup>35</sup> Such an arrangement is not a transfer, and requires no conveyance to pass the title. This, of course, only applies to parties to the arrangement and to persons claiming under them.<sup>36</sup> Mere caption of family arrangement given to the document is not decisive to exempt it from registration. The contents of such document are to be read as a whole to determine whether it is a family arrangement.<sup>37</sup> A family arrangement cannot override the mode of devolution as reflected in the will indicating the manner of disposition of the property.<sup>38</sup> Further, if the legal claims are settled by bona fide family arrangement which is fair and equitable, the same is final and binding on the parties.<sup>39</sup>

Partition--

A partition is not actually a transfer of property, but is analogous to an exchange. Justice Mookerjee, in a case decided by Calcutta High Court,<sup>40</sup> said that partition signifies the surrender of a portion of a joint right in exchange for a similar right from the co-sharer. Justice Spencer, in a case decided by Madras High Court,<sup>41</sup> said that a partition effects a change in the mode of enjoyment of property, but is not an act of conveying property from one living person to another. Partition is not a transfer. It is only renunciation of existing rights in common properties in consideration of getting exclusive right and possession over the specific plots. Partition is only a process of mutual renunciation by which common unspecified rights in larger extents are converted into exclusive right over specific plots.<sup>42</sup> In Sarin v Poplai CJ Gajendragadkar has observed that 'the true effect of partition is that each coparcener gets a specific property in lieu of his undivided right in respect of the totality of the property of the family'. The Supreme Court in that case was considering the provisions of a Rent Control Act, and did not express any opinion on the correctness of certain decisions<sup>44</sup> holding that a partition is a transfer within the meaning of s 53. The correct view, it is submitted, is that a partition is not a transfer, and therefore, strictly not governed by the TP Act, but that many of the provisions of the TP Act may govern partition as embodying rules of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>45</sup>

In some cases,<sup>46</sup> it has been held that a partition amounts to a transfer of property; in other cases however, it has been held that a partition is not transfer of property.<sup>47</sup> Partition of property does not amount to 'transfer' as contemplated by s 5. Doctrine of part performance, therefore, does not apply to partition. Partition is really a process, in and by which a joint enjoyment is transformed into an enjoyment severally. Each one of the co-sharers had an antecedent title and, therefore, no conveyance is involved in the process, as the conferment of a new title is not necessary.<sup>48</sup> The doctrine of part performance does not apply to an unregistered deed of partition.<sup>49</sup>

A partition is not actually a transfer of property, but would only signify the surrender of a portion of a joint right, in exchange for a similar right from the other co-sharer or co-sharers. However, irrespective of whether a case of partition is in terms covered by s 109, the principle of the section is applicable to partition, as embodying a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>50</sup>

A partition is possible between two co-owners who may not have absolute or equal rights, but are limited owners. A document executed in settlement of disputes between two persons who are entitled to the same properties and who agree to divide the properties amongst themselves is a partition, and not a settlement.<sup>51</sup>

Where a joint family property is subject to mortgage, there is no transfer of ownership and the coparceners, being its lawful owners, are competent to allot the mortgaged property in an oral partition to any of the coparceners. The coparcener to whom the mortgaged property is allotted, becomes its absolute owner and is entitled to redeem the mortgage. Consequently, where the right to redeem is transferred by that coparcener, the transferee is also entitled to redeem the mortgage.

Property subject to mortgage can be allotted in an oral partition to a coparcener, particularly when such oral partition is not going to interfere with the scheme of the mortgage.<sup>52</sup>

Partition Act --

The definition of transfer in this section is not applicable to the Partition Act, where it simply means a change of ownership.<sup>53</sup>

Document transferring plant and machinery--

Whether the transfer of plant and machinery fastened to the earth reported to be in a removable condition, when the transferor had no right to title to the land and the transferee having not acquired any interest in the land by reason of such transfer, could be defined as immovable property, was a question which was posed before the Allahabad High Court. It was held that the document regarding such conveyance is a transfer within the meaning of s 5 of the TP Act.<sup>54</sup>

Razinama and Kabulayet in Collector's books--

The effect of a razinama and kabulayet in the Collector's books has been the subject of conflicting decisions, but the better opinion is that it is not necessarily evidence of an intention to transfer, and that its effect depends upon the circumstances of each case.<sup>55</sup>

Recitals--

Recitals in deeds of mortgage and in petitions to officials do not, of course, amount to a transfer.<sup>56</sup> Where a partner contributed towards the capital of the firm by bringing in shares held by him in a company, then it is a 'transfer' within s 45, Income Tax Act 1961. To the extent to which exclusive interest is reduced to a shared interest, there is a transfer of interest.<sup>57</sup>

Release Deed--

If the person executing the release deed holds some right, title or interest in the property, release of that interest would amount to conveyance. However, if the transferor is a benamidar releasing the property to the real owner, it is not conveyance.<sup>58</sup>

Relinquishment--

A relinquishment is not an alienation,<sup>59</sup> unless an intention to transfer is found to exist, as when it is in favour of a person having no interest.<sup>60</sup> A registered instrument styled as a release deed releasing the right, title and interest of the executant in the property in favour of the releasee for valuable consideration may operate as a conveyance.<sup>61</sup>

Where the person in whose favour the 'release' is executed gets rights by virtue of the release, the deed may amount to a transfer. Thus, in a case decided by Madras High Court, by a deed of release, the releasor, after getting a sum of money from the person in whose favour release was executed, transferred his right, title and interest in half share of the suit properties absolutely in favour of the latter. The document could not be construed merely as enlarging the right of the latter, but gave him an absolute right in the half share which belonged to the releasor. Hence, it clearly comes under the definition of 'transfer' in s 5, and suit to set aside the document as 'fraudulent' will come only under s 53 of the TP Act.<sup>62</sup>

Surrender--

A surrender is not a transfer of property as defined in this section.<sup>63</sup> It is the falling of a lesser estate into a greater one.<sup>64</sup>

A deed of surrender simpliciter cannot effect any transfer of title.<sup>65</sup>

In the case of surrender by a life tenant in favour of a remainderman, there is no transfer of property. There is merely an effacement or extinguishment of the rights of the former, and an acceleration of the rights of the remainderman. The latter's right are derived from the document executed by the full owner, and when a deed of surrender is executed, full rights accrue to the remainderman in pursuance of the title derived under the settlement, and not from or through the life tenant who makes the surrender.<sup>66</sup>

Will --

These words exclude transfers by will, for a will operates from the death of the testator.<sup>67</sup> Transfer of share or interest in a co-operative society to the nominee of its member operating on his death would also be excluded like transfers by will.<sup>68</sup> Where the beneficiary is not a living person, the expression used is the creation of an interest in an unborn person contemplated under s 13. A Muslim gentleman executed a document styled as 'will'. By this document, he divided certain properties amongst his daughter and nephew in his life-time and gave possession to the persons named. It was held that it was a conveyance and not a will, even though it described the beneficiaries as 'heirs'. Not being a registered document, it was invalid.<sup>69</sup> Attestation prior to execution of the document is liable to be ignored, and is no attestation in the eyes of law.<sup>70</sup>

(8) Living Person--Will

Corporation--

The words 'living person' include a juristic person such as a corporation, company or association of persons or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, have been included amongst 'living person' in this section.<sup>71</sup> A court is not a juristic person.<sup>72</sup> The second paragraph has been added by the Amendment Act of 1929 in order to make it clear that the words embrace companies and societies, and that the general provisions of TP Act as to transfer do not affect the special provisions of the Companies Act.

An idol--

An idol is a juristic person capable of holding property,<sup>73</sup> but it is not a living person. An idol not being a living person, a dedication of land to an idol does not fall within the terms of s 122, and need not be made in writing or by a registered instrument under s 123 of TP Act.<sup>74</sup> It has also been said that an idol is only the symbol of the deity, and that it would be contrary to the Hindu religion that a deity should make an acceptance of worldly goods.<sup>75</sup>

Wakf--

These decisions must be distinguished from a decision of Allahabad High Court where it was held that a Mahomedan wakf, which is a dedication of property to God, is voidable at the option of creditors, if made with intent to defraud creditors, under s 53 of the TP Act, there being no rule of Mahomedan law inconsistent with the provisions of that section.<sup>76</sup>

(9) In Present or in Future

A transfer of property may take place not only in present, but also in the future,<sup>77</sup> but the property must be in existence. The words 'in present or in future' qualify the word 'conveys', and not the word 'property'.<sup>78</sup> A transfer of property that is not in existence operates as a contract to be performed in the future which may be specifically enforced as soon as the property comes into existence.<sup>79</sup> In Rajah Sahib Perhlad v Budhoo,<sup>80</sup> the Privy Council said:

But how can there be any transfer, actual or constructive, upon a contract under which the vendor sells that of which he has not possession, and to which he may never establish a title? The bill of sale in such a case can only be evidence of a contract to be performed in future, and upon the happening of a contingency, of which the purchaser may claim a specific performance, if he comes into court showing that he has himself done all that he was bound to do.

The Supreme Court in Bharat Nidhi's case held that as soon as the property comes into existence and is capable of being identified, equity taking as done that which ought to be done fastens upon the property, and the contract to assign thus becomes a complete equitable assignment.<sup>81</sup>

It has been held that a transfer of non-existent or, as it is conveniently called, after-acquired property, provided it is not of the nature contemplated in s 6(a), is perfectly valid and is to be regarded in a court as a contract to transfer after the vendor acquires the title, and will fasten upon the property as soon as the vendor acquires it.<sup>82</sup> While it is true that the law of India does not recognise equitable assignment or equitable estate, it is difficult to say that the right of the transferee in such circumstances is a purely personal right which can only be enforced under s 18(a) of the Specific Relief Act or by a suit for damages, as upon such a transfer or afterwards acquiring the property, an obligation undoubtedly attaches to the property under s 40, and the transfer also operates under s 43 on the interest acquired by the transferor.<sup>83</sup>

The interest of the transferee, however, may not prevail against a bona fide transferee for value.

A mortgage of a future crop has been recognised, but such a mortgage will not affect a transferee without notice.<sup>84</sup>

Transfer of a chance of receiving a gratuitous payment at the discretion of an employer for services being or about to be rendered consists of a possibility, and cannot be transferred.<sup>85</sup>

- (c) An easement cannot be transferred apart from the dominant heritage.
- (d) An interest in property restricted in its enjoyment to the owner personally cannot be transferred by him.
- (dd) A right to future maintenance, in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined, cannot be transferred.
- (e) A mere right to sue cannot be transferred.

- (i) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy, the farmer of an estate in respect of which default has been made in paying revenue, or the lessee of an estate, under the management of a Court of Wards, to assign his interest as such tenant, farmer or lessee.

(1) Amendments

This section was amended by the amending Act 1929.

(2) Property of Any Kind

These words indicate that transferability is the general rule, and that the right to property includes the right to transfer the property to another person.<sup>86</sup> The onus of proof is on the person alleging that any kind of property is not transferable.<sup>87</sup> To this rule, the clauses constitute exceptions. Some of the exceptions are similar to those made in s 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 as to property which cannot be attached, eg a service tenure or a right to future maintenance or a public office or a pension; but decisions under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 are not always a safe guide,<sup>88</sup> and a private alienation may be made of property the attachment of which is prohibited, eg the tools of artisans.<sup>89</sup> The Rajasthan High Court has held that a gift, being a transfer without consideration, is not hit by s 6(h) which, inter alia, invalidates a transfer which hits s 23, Indian Contract Act 1872. It has further held that where past cohabitation is only a motive and not a consideration for the transfer, the transfer is not void.<sup>90</sup> It has been held that a property such as coal ash, which is not in existence on the day of the contract, but would be available in due course of time becomes potential property, and a sale in respect of such a property is established by a contract. The title in such property passes onto the purchaser, although it is held by the seller in the capacity of a trustee.<sup>91</sup>

Property of any kind does not include future property,<sup>92</sup> for a transfer of future property can only operate as a contract which may be specifically performed when the property comes into existence.<sup>93</sup>

Statutory rights of claimants to compensation which crystallize on assessment and verification of claims are separate rights to property, and cannot vanish or evaporate on the death of the claimant.<sup>94</sup>

In a dispute with regard to area, the boundary of the land or the plot number of the instrument/document would be determinative of the issue.<sup>95</sup>

(3) Exceptions Made by TP Act

These are set forth in the clauses to the section.

(4) Exceptions Made by any Other Law

The Supreme Court has held that an embargo upon the owner of the land to transfer the same should not be readily inferred. Right of transfer of land is undisputably incidental to the right of ownership. Such a right can be curtailed or taken away only by reason of a statute.<sup>96</sup> Restrictions are placed by Hindu law on the transfer of coparcenary property, and of property dedicated to religious uses. Mahomedan law imposes restrictions on the transfer of wakf property. Various local Acts as well as local customs restrict the transfer of agricultural tenancies. This is also the case with land held on service tenures, such as watan land in Bombay, karnam land in Madras, and ghatwal land in Bengal. Service tenures also fall under the exception in cl (d) of this section.

(5) Clause (a)--Spes Successionis

The possibilities referred to in this clause are bare possibilities, and not possibilities coupled with an interest such as contingent remainders and future interest.<sup>97</sup>

The present interest of a widow in the property inherited by her from her husband can be transferred along with the incidental right of succeeding to the entire estate of the husband on the death of her co-widow.<sup>98</sup> With reference to a contingent interest, the Judicial Committee said:

It is something quite different from a mere possibility of a like nature of an heir-apparent succeeding to the estate, or the chance of a relation obtaining a legacy, and also something quite different from a mere right to sue. It is a well ascertained form of property -- it certainly has been transferred in this country for generations -- in respect of which it is quite possible to raise money and to dispose off it in any way the beneficiary chooses.<sup>99</sup>

Illustration

A Hindu, owning separate property dies leaving a widow B and a brother C. C has only a bare chance of succession in case he survives B, and this spes successionis he cannot transfer. But if A during his lifetime makes a settlement of his separate property to his wife for her life and then to his son if he should have one, and in default of a son to B, B has an interest contingent on A having no son, and that interest is transferable.

When the rights of an adopted son are curtailed by an agreement giving the widow of the adoptive father the right to enjoy the property during her lifetime, the interest of the son is not a spes successionis, but is a vested interest, enjoyment and possession only being postponed.<sup>1</sup>

(6) Transfer by Heir-apparent

An heir-apparent is a person who would be the heir if he survived the propositus and if the propositus died intestate. Such a possibility is in English law not an interest or even a contingent title. The law was stated in Parsons IN RE.<sup>2</sup> as follows:

It is indisputable law that no one can have any estate or interest at law or in equity, contingent or other, in the property of a living person to which he hopes to succeed as heir at law or next of kin of such living person. During the lifetime of such person no one can have more than a spes successions, an expectation or hope of succeeding to his property.

The chance of a Mahomedan heir succeeding is a mere spes successionis, and cannot be the subject of a transfer or a release.<sup>3</sup>

Illustration

A has a wife B and a daughter C. C in consideration of Rs 1,000 paid to her by A, executes a release of her right to share in the inheritance to A's property. A dies and C claims her one-third share in the inheritance. B resists the claim and sets up the release signed by C. The release is no defence, for it is a transfer of a spes successions, and C is entitled to her one-third share but is bound to bring into account the Rs 1,000 received from her father.<sup>4</sup>

Where however, the transfer is not of the right of expectancy of an heir apparent but of the property itself, it cannot be said to be a transfer of a mere chance to succeed. Thus, when a person is not heard of for a long time and is believed to be dead, an agreement to transfer the property, entered into by his brother who is in enjoyment and possession of the property in dispute, is not a transfer of the right of expectancy, but of the property itself and is not hit by cl (a) of s 6.<sup>5</sup>

(7) Transfer by Hindu Reversioner

By the Hindu law the right of a reversionary heir expectant on the death of a Hindu widow is a spes successionis, and its transfer is a nullity and has no effect in law.<sup>6</sup>

In Amirt Narayan v Goya Singh<sup>7</sup> the Privy Council said:

A Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in proesenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or relinquish or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is mere spes successionis.

For the same reason, a relinquishment by or on behalf of a reversionary heir of the reversionary right to succeed is invalid.<sup>8</sup> This rule of Hindu law was applied to Hindus independently of the present section by the Privy Council.<sup>9</sup> Since the Amending Act of 1929, the present section applies directly to Hindus.<sup>10</sup> If the reversioner purports to release his interests to the widow, her interest is in no way enlarged and the release cannot take effect as vesting in her the absolute estate in the property left by her husband.<sup>11</sup> Such a release might amount to an acknowledgment that the widow had an absolute right,<sup>12</sup> but the acknowledgement would not be binding on any one who may be the heir when the succession opens out.<sup>13</sup> But if the widow claims a property as her own, and the reversioner alleges it forms part of her husband's estate, and the dispute is bona fide settled between the parties, the settlement is binding on the whole body of reversioners, though the transaction might appear in one of its aspects as a dealing with a spes successionis.<sup>14</sup> The reversioner 'can relinquish his right to say that the properties in dispute form part of the estate to which he is the reversioner'.<sup>15</sup>

It was held by the Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid v Kadmaniandra Deviah,<sup>16</sup> that the principle of feeding the estoppel recognised in s 43 of the TP Act would apply to a case where a reversioner purports to transfer properties to which he has only a chance of succeeding if he has represented to the transferee that he was absolutely entitled to the properties, and if he subsequently acquires title to the properties. The court overruled a decision of the Madras High Court in Official Assignee of Madras v Sampath Naidu,<sup>17</sup> and held that though s 43 would not apply when the transferee knew the facts, there was no reason why a transferee who was not aware of the true facts and who acted on the fraudulent representation should not have the benefit of the equitable doctrine embodied in s 43. This view is in accordance with decisions of the High Court of Allahabad, Bombay, Madras, Nagpur and Patna.<sup>18</sup> No question of invoking the section can, of course, arise where a reversioner transfers his reversionary interest which has been expressly declared to be non-transferable by the TP Act.<sup>19</sup>

Agreement by Hindu reversioner to transfer--

An agreement by reversionary heir to transfer or to relinquish his right of succession is also void.<sup>20</sup> In Annada v Gour Mohan,<sup>21</sup> the Privy Council said that it was impossible for them to admit the common sense of maintaining an enactment which would prevent the purpose of the contract, while permitting the contract to stand as a contract.

The Bombay High Court has held that the equitable doctrine which regards that done which ought to be done, is excluded by the express prohibition in this section, and that an agreement by a person not to claim a share of an inheritance when it falls in, is void.<sup>22</sup> In some cases such agreements have (it is submitted erroneously) been held to be valid as agreements to take effect on a contingency.<sup>23</sup> The Allahabad High Court has in a series of cases<sup>24</sup> treated such agreement as valid, but the correctness of these decisions was doubted by CJ Piggott in Chahlu v Parmal,<sup>25</sup> and they must be taken as overruled by Annada v Gour Mohan.<sup>26</sup> The case of Chahlu v Parmal<sup>27</sup> was, however, a peculiar one and called for the application of another doctrine. In that case, there were four separated brothers. A, B, C and D. B died and A took his share and remarried his widow. Then D died and A agreed with C not to claim D's share after D's widow should die. But when D's widow died he did claim a share and the dispute was settled by a compromise that A should keep B's share and that C should keep D's share. This was a valid family settlement, and even if A's agreement not to claim D's share was invalid, yet A could not claim that share without bringing B's share into account.

Since an agreement to transfer a reversion is void, the court will not allow such an agreement to be embodied in a consent decree.<sup>28</sup> However, if a suit has been filed on an invalid agreement to assign the reversion, it may become the subject of a valid compromise after the reversion has fallen in.<sup>29</sup>

Although an agreement to transfer a reversion is void, yet an alternative promise may constitute a valid substituted contract under s 58 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. In Mahadeo Prasad v Mathura,<sup>30</sup> there was an agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee by which the mortgagee agreed not to recover the balance due on his mortgage during the lifetime of a Hindu widow, and at her death to accept in discharge either a share of the mortgagor's reversion in three villages owned by the widow, or a share in another village owned by the mortgagor. This was held to be invalid as to the three villages, but valid as to the other village.

Estoppel of reversioner--

Although both the transfer and the agreement to transfer a reversionary interest are void, yet a reversioner may be estopped from claiming the reversion by his conduct if he has consented to an alienation by a widow or other limited heir.<sup>31</sup>

Illustrations

(1) A Hindu widow executed a deed of gift of a part of her husband's property to D. F., who was then the nearest reversioner joined in the deed. On the widow's death F claimed the property pleading that the gift was invalid. F having consented to the gift is estopped from disputing its validity.<sup>32</sup>

(2) Tayava, a Hindu widow, disposed of the greater part of her husband's property by three deeds executed and registered on the same day. The first was a deed of gift to her brother, which was attested by the reversioner. The second was a deed of sale to one Annagowda, and the third was a deed of sale to her son-in-law. All the deeds formed part of the same transaction and were executed with Annagowda's consent. The Privy Council said:

If some other person than Annagowda had been, at the death of Tayava, the nearest heir to her husband, it might have been open to him to question all or any of the three deeds but Annagowda himself being a party to and benefitting by the transaction evidenced thereby was precluded from questioning any part of it.<sup>33</sup>

This is particularly the case if the reversioner had been a party to a compromise,<sup>34</sup> or after they should be enfranchised in the name of the transferor as an agreement for the transfer family settlement,<sup>35</sup> entered into by a widow or other limited heir which involves an alienation of the estate by her and if he has benefited by the transaction. Different considerations prevail, if the renunciation or relinquishment proceeds on a settlement of conflicting claims or bona fide disputes.<sup>36</sup>

Illustrations

(1) A Hindu died leaving as his heirs two daughters. Nevertheless, two separated cousins claimed the inheritance, and the dispute was settled by a compromise under which the property was partitioned and a fourth share was allotted to each cousin and daughter, as absolute owner. On the death of one daughter without issue, the sons of one of the cousins claimed to succeed to her quarter share as reversionary heir. The court held that as they had taken the place of their father and had, ever since his death, enjoyed possession of the share allotted to him, they were estopped from claiming as reversionary heirs.<sup>37</sup>

(2) A Hindu governed by the Benares school of law dies leaving a widow and three daughters two of whom have sons. The widow claimed to be absolutely entitled to certain properties which the daughters said belonged to their father. As there was a doubt about their rights, the members of the family agreed and arranged among themselves that the whole property should be divided among the daughters and their sons, the widow surrendering her share. Each daughter accepted the property allotted to her in severality in lieu of the undivided share in the whole estate which would have devolved upon her on the mother's death and abandoned the right of survivorship on the death of either of her sisters. 38 years later, after the death of the mother and two sisters, the third sister sued as heir of her father to recover a property sold to the defendant by one of the deceased sisters. The Privy Council said that in view of the favour shown by the court to family arrangements and the long period of time which had elapsed since the arrangement was made, the plaintiff could not be allowed to repudiate the arrangement and impeach a sale which had been made upon the faith of it.<sup>38</sup>

Compromises and family arrangements do not operate as transfers of reversionary interest, but as said by the Judicial Committee in Rani Mewa Kuwar v Rani Hulas Kunwar<sup>39</sup> and by the Supreme Court in Sadhu Madho Das v Pandit Mukand Ram,<sup>40</sup> are based on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties, and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is. A compromise implies an existing dispute, but a family arrangement may be concluded for the avoidance of future disputes.<sup>41</sup>

Where a son had entered into an arrangement with his father that he should be given a certain sum in consideration of his being considered to have separated, the agreement was held to be a family arrangement, and not contrary to s 6(a) of TP Act.<sup>42</sup> However, a member of the family who has not joined the family arrangement may challenge the same.<sup>43</sup>

(8) Mahomedan Law and Transfer of Spes Successionis

The present section does not apply in terms to Mahomedans.<sup>44</sup> The transfer of expectancy is invalid under that law.<sup>45</sup> It has been held that in the case of Mahomedans the transfer of expectancy by a heir presumptive is void ab initio and that no question of an estoppel can, therefore, arise by reason of the heir renouncing her claim before the expectancy opens.<sup>46</sup> This decision though justified on the facts of the case, errors, it is submitted, in stating the principle thus. The equitable estoppel arises in such cases not because the transfer is voidable, but because of the conduct of the transferor who purports to effect a transfer which is contrary to the provisions of law and, therefore, void.<sup>47</sup>

The object of the rule of Muslim law which does not recognise a purported transfer of a spes successionis as legally valid, is not to 'prohibit' anything within the terms of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 (which invalidates agreements prohibited or opposed to public policy), but merely to make clear what is, and what is not, a transferable right or interest in property. Its purpose could not be to protect those who receive consideration for such a transfer.

The object--

The protection of any party could be the object underlying such a rule--

The protection of possible transferees, so that they may know what is, and what is not, a legally enforceable transfer.<sup>48</sup>

(9) Transfer of Spes Successionis in Punjab

The High Court of Lahore has held that the transfer of an expectancy is valid in Punjab where the TP Act does not apply,<sup>49</sup> and that a declaratory suit with reference to a spes successionis is maintainable.<sup>50</sup> The law applicable there, is in substance, the rule of English law stated in the next paragraph.

(10) Chance of a Legacy

The chance of a relation or a friend receiving a legacy is a possibility even more remote than the chance of succession of an heir, and is not transferable.<sup>51</sup>

(11) Other Possibilities of a Life Nature

The usual illustration of a possibility is the case of a fisherman's net. There is no certainty that any fish will be caught, and the fisherman has no interest in the fish until they are caught. An agreement for the sale of otkarnam lands is a possibility and is, therefore, void.<sup>52</sup> There is a conflict of decisions as to whether a right to receive future offerings at a temple can be assigned. Some cases take the view that the chance that future worshippers will give offerings is a mere possibility which cannot be transferred,<sup>53</sup> while others hold that the right to receive offerings is not so uncertain, variable and limited as to pass out of the conception of the law.<sup>54</sup> With reference to the right to receive offerings at the sacred shrine of Shri Vaishno Devi Ji (Jammu and Kashmir), it has been held that the right is heritable.

The High Court observed:

Although the right to receive the offerings from the pilgrims resorting to the shrine depends upon the chance that future pilgrims and worshippers will give offerings, the right to receive the offerings made is a valuable, definite and tangible right and is not merely a possibility of the nature referred to in s 6(a) of the Transfer of Property Act.<sup>55</sup>

Offerings that have actually been made may, of course, be transferred; and the Bombay High Court has held that the priest's share of the utpat or net balance of the offerings to an idol may be attached.<sup>56</sup> Future wages of a servant before they are earned are a mere expectancy which cannot be attached or sold.<sup>57</sup> Prior to the completion of a sale, a vendor's interest in the purchase money is only a possibility which cannot be transferred.<sup>58</sup> However, when land which had been acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, was restored by government to one of the owners on his undertaking to transfer their respective shares to the co-owners, the latter had a beneficial interest in the land, and not a mere possibility.<sup>59</sup> As to the words 'of a like nature', it has been held that they indicate possibilities of the same kind as the chance of a legacy,<sup>60</sup> or a chance of being paid a gratuity.<sup>61</sup> However, a contract for the sale of a property which is not the vendor's at the time of the contract, but which the vendor thinks of acquiring by purchase later on, is not bad in law.<sup>62</sup> A customary right to scavenge is not a kind of property which can be transferred.<sup>63</sup>

(12) Clause (b)--Transfer of Right of Re-entry

This is the right referred to in s 111 (g) which the lessor has against the lessee for breach of an express condition, which provides that on its breach the lessor may re-enter. Such a condition is a condition subsequent defined in s 31 which divests an estate which has already vested. A right of re-entry implies an estate of reversion, and cannot be transferred apart from the estate to which it belongs. The transfer of the reversion, ie, of the lessor's interest, carries with it the right of re-entry.

A 'mere right of re-entry' refers to the right of re-entry which a transferor reserves to himself, after having parted with the whole estate, for breach of a condition subsequent. The transfer of a lessor's interest including a right of re-entry is not a transfer of a mere right of re-entry, and is valid.

The expression 'mere right of re-entry', therefore, means a right of re-entry apart from any interest in the property. If not accompanied by an interest in property, it is a personal license and not transferable. This is illustrated by the case of Re Davis & Co IN RE. , ex parte Rawlings.<sup>64</sup> In that case, goods were delivered under a hire purchase agreement which gave the bailor a right to enter the premises where the goods were kept, and take possession in default of payment of any installment. The bailor assigned his rights under the agreement by way of security to his creditor; it was held that the creditor could not enforce the right of re-entry as it was only a personal license which was not assignable.

(13) Clause (c)-- Transfer of Easement

An easement is defined in s 4 of the Easements Act 5 of 1882 as 'a right which the owner or occupier of certain land possesses, as such, for the beneficial enjoyment of that land, to do and continue to do something or to prevent and continue to prevent something being done, in or upon, or in respect of, certain other land not his own.' An easement includes a profit a prendre, ie, a right to enjoy a profit out of the land of another.<sup>65</sup> An easement cannot be detached from the dominant heritage, but passes with it as a legal incident to the property transferred.

This is enacted in s 8 of TP Act, and in s 19 of the Indian Easements Act 1882. The present section in effect enacts that there cannot be an easement in gross.<sup>66</sup> A thing in gross exists in its own right, and not as an appendage to another thing. An easement cannot be in gross, for it must be a right over one piece of land for the benefit of another piece of land and, therefore, cannot be transferred without the land that has the benefit of it. Right of way which may be enjoyed irrespective of a dominant heritage as sometimes called easement in gross, but this is an incorrect use of the term.<sup>67</sup>

In India there are various rights which resemble easements, but are really not easements. They are customary rights saved by s 2(b) of the Indian Easements Act 1882,<sup>68</sup> such as a kamaki right to collect leaves for manure and to pasture cattle;<sup>69</sup> a right to use the land of another person for a holi festival;<sup>70</sup> or for a bathing ghat,<sup>71</sup> or for a burial ground,<sup>72</sup> or for the celebration of the mohurrum,<sup>73</sup> or of the ram lila.<sup>74</sup> Such rights are independent of any dominant heritage.<sup>75</sup>

The section refers to the transfer of an existing easements, and not to the grant of an easement. The grant of an easement is not a transfer of property,<sup>76</sup> and the provisions of the TP Act have no application to the creation of easements.<sup>77</sup> An easement may be released in favour of the owner of the servient tenement, but such a release effects not a transfer, but an extinction of the easement.<sup>78</sup> The imposition, acquisition and transfer of easements, is governed by the provisions of chapter II of the Indian Easements Act 1882 (ss 8-18).

(14) Clause (d) -- Restricted Interests

An interest restricted in enjoyment to the owner personally is by its very nature not transferable, unless the restriction is void under s 10. A transfer of such property would defeat the object of the restriction. For instance, the object of a right of pre-emption is to prevent the introduction to strangers as co-sharers, and the sale of such a right to an outsider would defeat that object. A grant for parwarish is restricted in enjoyment to the grantee, and cannot be alienated.<sup>79</sup> In the case of a religious office J Macpherson said:

Such a sale would practically destroy the endowment, or have the effect of defeating the whole object of its creation. There would be no guarantee that the service would be properly kept up; for the purchaser whoever he might be -- even if a Mahomedan or a Christian -- would have the right of performing the worship of this Hindu idol.<sup>80</sup>

Again, with reference to the sale by urallers or trustees of a Hindu temple, the Privy Council said that where the founder of a religious endowment may be supposed to have established a corporation with the distinct object of securing the due performance of the worship, and the due administration of the property, by the instrumentality and at the discretion of its members, they have no power to transfer their right.<sup>81</sup> For this reason, a religious office is not a transferable property.<sup>82</sup> The office of shebait of a temple,<sup>83</sup> or mahani of a math,<sup>84</sup> or mutwalli of a wakf,<sup>85</sup> cannot be transferred. A vritti is not saleable property;<sup>86</sup> nor the right of village joshi to perform religious ceremonies at the house of his yajman;<sup>87</sup> nor the birt maha brahmani or right to officiate at funeral ceremonies;<sup>88</sup> nor birt khakrobi rights.<sup>89</sup> The life interest holders having a mere right of residence cannot transfer such restricted interest.<sup>90</sup>

A paid or turn of worship, and the pujari's right to receive offerings are res extra commuerium, and cannot be alienated,<sup>91</sup> though by custom they may be transferable to another Brahmin.<sup>92</sup> The sale of vajman vahis or pilgrim visitor's books is not invalid, but the sale carries with it no right to act as guide to the pilgrims.<sup>93</sup>

It has been held by the Patna High Court in Zobair Ahmad v Jainandan,<sup>94</sup> following a decision of the Privy Council,<sup>95</sup> and earlier decisions of the same High Court,<sup>96</sup> that the right of a Mahomedan widow to retain possession of her husband's property in lieu of her dower debt is personal to her, and is a restricted interest within the meaning of s 6(d). The court refused to follow certain other decisions<sup>97</sup> to the contrary on the ground that those decisions were no longer good law in view of the decisions of the Privy Council.

However, where the transferor was the absolute owner of the property gifted and it was not restricted in its enjoyment to herself, the Supreme Court held that s 6(d) was not attracted.<sup>98</sup>

(15) Custom

It has been held in several cases that the inalienable character of a religious office may be affected by custom, and alienation to members of the founder's family or of the priestly family has sometimes been permitted.<sup>99</sup> Chief Justice Rankin in Panchanan v Surendra Nath<sup>1</sup> said that some of the cases on this point<sup>2</sup> ought not to be followed; and pointed out that the Privy Council in Rajah Vurmah v Ravi Vwmah<sup>3</sup> said that a custom sanctioning the sale of a trusteeship for the pecuniary advantage of the trustees would be bad in law.

The cases cited in this paragraph refer to Hindu religious offices, and were decided before the amending Act of 1929. Now that this chapter of the TP Act supersedes the Hindu law, it is open to question whether a customary right of transfer can be recognised, if it conflicts with s 6(d). Possibly where the interest in the enjoyment of the office is by custom restricted not to the incumbent personally, but to the members of his family, a transfer to a member of the family may not be in contravention of this sub-section.

(16) Service Tenures

In service tenures the interest in the land is the remuneration for the personal service to be rendered. It is, therefore, a necessary incident of such tenures that they should be incapable of alienation. Thus, ghatwal tenures in Bengal, created to provide a local military and police force, are inalienable,<sup>4</sup> and cannot be sold in execution of a decree against the ghatwal,<sup>5</sup> but if the performance of military service is abolished, as in the case of palyan land in Madras, the alienations would be valid.<sup>6</sup> A chowkidar in Bengal who holds chakran lands cannot alienate them beyond the term of his office.<sup>7</sup> A watandar in Bombay cannot alienate watan land beyond his lifetime to a person who is not a member of the watan family.<sup>8</sup> The prohibition against alienation in the Watan Act is not absolute, for s 5 allows alienation with the sanction of the Collector, and a watandar may be estopped from impeaching his alienation.<sup>9</sup> Kamarn lands in Madras cannot be alienated by the holder of the office to the prejudice of his successor.<sup>10</sup> Inam lands or the performance of swastivachakam service in a temple cannot be alienated.<sup>11</sup> However, a right to money charged upon land with the object that religious ceremonies should be performed may be transferred, for if the performance of ceremonies is not a condition precedent to payment, it does not constitute a religious office.<sup>12</sup> Muafi lands, ie, granted with a remission of revenue to certain Brahmins and their descendants on condition that they should give their blessings to the Maharaja of Nepal are transferable.<sup>13</sup>

Land held on service tenure may lose its character of inalienability. In Radha Bai v Anantrav,<sup>14</sup> J West said:

When an estate is freed from its connection with a public office, the reason arising from that connection for the preservation of the estate intact and unencumbered necessarily fails.

Similarly, in Bhagwal Baksh Ray v Sheo Prosad Sahu,<sup>15</sup> it was said that:

On principle, it may well be maintained that when service can no longer be enforced and the tenure consequently ceases to be a service tenure, the land can be alienated.

Accordingly, a ghatwal tenure loses its character of inalienability when the services have been commuted by a money payment,<sup>16</sup> or the tenure on military service has been abolished.<sup>17</sup>

Resumption of service tenure--

A service tenure may be (1) a grant of an office for which the land is the remuneration; or (2) a grant of land burdened with a condition of service.

In case (1) the land is prima facie resumable, but in case (2) the land is not resumable, unless a condition of resumption is expressed in the terms of the grant or implied from the circumstances under which it was made. The onus is on the grantor to prove such a condition.<sup>18</sup>

However, once the tenure has been established, it is not terminated by obsolescence and desuetude, but it is 'necessary to find something done or omitted to be done on the part of the government, as the grantors, which would have the legal effect of a surrender and regrant of the lands on new terms, or, at any rate, of a release of the right to appoint the ghatwal and call for the performance of the services'.<sup>19</sup>

(17) Right of Pre-emption Not Transferable

The right of pre-emption, has been defined as a right in the event of a sale to purchase the property upon agreed terms.<sup>20</sup> It can only be exercised as to immovable property. It is a purely personal right, which cannot be transferred to a stranger. The object of the right is to prevent the introduction of strangers as co-sharers, and the right is enforced on the assumption that the introduction of strangers causes inconvenience to the pre-emptive co-sharers. It is a transient right in its very inception and nature, and being a personal privilege cannot be transferred to anyone except the owner of the property affected thereby.<sup>21</sup> Where a pre-emptor in anticipation of his success in a pre-emption suit transfers the 'pre-emptorial' property, he is not entitled to enforce his right of pre-emption.<sup>22</sup> However, a plaintiff who has obtained a decree for pre-emption may mortgage his rights under the decree in order to put himself in funds to pay the purchase money for the pre-empted property.<sup>23</sup> The right of pre-emption is a Mahomedan law right, and that is the only system of law which provides substantive rules for its enforcement.<sup>24</sup> This law is applied as between Mahomedans as a matter of 'justice, equity and good conscience' by all the courts in India, except in the Madras Presidency where the courts have declined to apply it on the ground that it places a restriction on the liberty of transfer.<sup>25</sup> Right of pre-emption has received statutory recognition in Punjab by the Punjab Laws Act 1872, and in Oudh by the Oudh Laws Act 1876. The right also exists by custom among Hindus in Bihar,<sup>26</sup> and certain parts of Gujarat.

The right of pre-emption is sometimes given by contract or covenant. Where a purchaser gave a right of pre-emption to one of his vendors if he could raise the price before a certain day without the help of others, the right was held to be incapable of assignment.<sup>27</sup> Where a statute providing for a right of pre-emption lays down that it accrues only when transfer of the property takes place and such transfer is not complete except through a registered deed, a suit filed before the sale deed is executed is premature as the right of pre-emption under the statute did not accrue till the transfer became effective through a registered deed.<sup>28</sup>

(18) Contract

The benefit of a contract can be assigned as an actionable claim. This is, however, subject to two exceptions in the case of an executory contract, (1) when the contract is one which had been induced by personal qualifications or considerations as to the parties to it; and (2) when the benefit is coupled with an obligation which the assignor is bound to discharge.<sup>29</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) Where R agreed with M to grow indigo for him taking the seeds from M's factory and cultivating it according to M's instructions, it was held that the contract was entered into with reference to the personal position and qualifications of M, and that he could not assign it.<sup>30</sup> In such a case, the enjoyment of the benefit of the contract is restricted to the party personally and cannot be transferred.
- (2) In a similar case,<sup>31</sup> A agreed to manufacture salt for B, and the terms of the contract allowed B credit for payment, and a discretion as to the quantity of salt to be demanded, and it was held that B could not assign the contract.

(19) Clause (dd) -- Transfer of Right to Maintenance

This clause was added by the amending Act of 1929. Prior to the amendment there was a conflict of opinion whether a right of future maintenance when it was fixed by a decree was transferable, it being held Madras High Court that it was,<sup>32</sup> and by Calcutta High Court that it was not.<sup>33</sup> The amendment supersedes the decisions of Madras High Court. Section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 also exempts a right of future maintenance from attachment.<sup>34</sup>

The effect of this clause is that the assignment of a decree for maintenance would be valid as to maintenance already accrued due, but not as to future maintenance.

The words 'in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined' are very comprehensive; and it is submitted that they overrule cases in which when the right has been created by a deed of transfer, it was held that the question whether the right was alienable depends upon the intention of the parties as expressed in the deed.<sup>35</sup>

The right of a Hindu widow to maintenance is a personal right and from its nature incapable of assignment;<sup>36</sup> but arrears of maintenance can be attached and sold like any other debt.<sup>37</sup> The interest of a Hindu widow in land which has been allotted to her for her maintenance is not property which can be attached.<sup>38</sup> However, if land is assigned to a Hindu widow in lieu of maintenance, the transfer of such land is not a transfer of a right of maintenance, and is valid during the widow's lifetime.<sup>39</sup> When villages were allotted to a person, under a compromise, for his maintenance and without power of transfer during his brother's lifetime, the Privy Council held that his interest was a right of future maintenance and could not be attached,<sup>40</sup> but a receiver was allowed to be appointed to realise the rents and pay what was sufficient for the maintenance of the judgment-debtor, and the balance to his creditors.

Where, however, a Mahomedan widow retains possession of property in lieu of her dower debt, she cannot transfer the property even during her lifetime.

A hereditary grant of an allowance of paddy out of the melwaram of land is not a right to future maintenance.<sup>41</sup> Grants out of the revenue of an impartible estate for the maintenance of cadets of the family are alienable with a reversion to the grantor on the death of the last male heir.<sup>42</sup>

An annuity granted by will is not a right to future maintenance, and may be attached or sold.<sup>43</sup> There is, however, a difference between a maintenance allowance and an annuity.<sup>44</sup> A vested life interest under a will in a definite fund or income of a property is transferable.<sup>45</sup> An annuity granted by way of maintenance by deed which creates a charge on land, has been held to be alienable;<sup>46</sup> but in view of the words 'in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined' it is doubtful if this decision is still good law. Thus, in Bibi Haliman v Bibi Umadalunmssa,<sup>47</sup> the Patna High Court came to the conclusion that a right of this nature though made a charge on immovable property, could not be transferred. When a settlor creates a trust of his property, and reserves an allowance for himself, the allowance is not maintenance within this clause.<sup>48</sup>

(20) Clause (e)-- Transfer of a Mere Right to Sue

Prior to the amending Act 2 of 1900 this clause was-- 'a mere right to sue/or compensation for a fraud or for harm illegally caused cannot be transferred'. The amending Act of 1900 widened the clause by omitting the words other than 'a mere right to sue', and at the same time restricted the definition of actionable claim (which formerly embraced all claims which a civil court recognised as affording grounds for relief) to debts and beneficial interests in movable property not in possession. The effect of this amendment was to make clear the distinction between property and a right to sue. As before the amendment, a right to sue for damages for breach of contract would have been an actionable claim, although such right was not property not attachable as such. Again the former definition was inadequate, for it was limited to rights of suit for damages for tort. Such rights are undoubtedly not assignable; but there are other rights to sue arising out of contract which also cannot be assigned.<sup>49</sup>

In England, what were called bare or naked rights of litigation were regarded not assignable at common law as they savoured of champerty and maintenance. At equity, however, each such transaction was considered on its merits, and if it was found to be tainted with champerty or maintenance it would be struck down.<sup>50</sup> However, equity would not 'emulate the hysteria of the common law in smelling out maintenance where no maintenance was'.<sup>51</sup> It was held that the basis of s 6(e) is this rule of English Law.<sup>52</sup> The Supreme Court, in Union of India v Sri Sara Mills Ltd,<sup>53</sup> has held that:

Section 6(e) of the Transfer of Property Act states that a mere right to sue cannot be transferred. A bare right of action might be claims to damages for breach of contract or claims to damages for tort. An assignment of a mere right to litigation is bade. An assignment of property is valid even although that property may be incapable of being received without litigation. The reason behind the rule is that a bare right of action for damages is not assignable because, the law will not recognise any transaction which may savour of maintenance of champerty. It is only when there is an interest in the subject-matter that a transaction can be saved from the imputation of maintenance. That interest must exist apart from the assignment and to that extent must be independent of it.

A Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court<sup>54</sup> has, in similar words, indicated the true scope of the clause:

The basis of the exception being that (a) transaction savouring of maintenance or champerty should not be recognised, it follows that a transaction not open to the charge would be upheld. Therefore, soon an exception to the rule of a bare right of action being assignable came to be recognised. This exception provides that a right of action may be assigned if it be incidental or subsidiary to a conveyance of property. From the aforesaid historical background it is clear how s 6(e) of the Transfer of Property Act which provides that a mere right to sue cannot be transferred is associated with the exception of the bare right of action not being assignable. It is equally clear that the provision being aimed against transactions which according to English law would amount to champerty and maintenance, whenever a transaction would be free of such charge, it would be valid.

It should also be remembered that the specific rules of English law against champerty and maintenance have not been adopted in India, and English decisions on what is a naked right of action are not always a safe guide in determining cases arising under this clause.<sup>55</sup>

A right to sue is personal to the party aggrieved, and there can be no assignment of a right to sue for damages for tort or for breach of contract.<sup>56</sup> For the same reason, a mere right to sue is not an interest which vests in the receiver in insolvency,<sup>57</sup> or which can be attached.

However, where a property is transferred along with a right to recover damages or compensation in respect of that property, the assignment of the right is valid, and is not hit by this clause.<sup>58</sup> Similarly, when a company which is a plaintiff in a pending suit is amalgamated with another company, the right of the amalgamated company to be substituted as plaintiff is not hit by this clause.<sup>59</sup> The insurer having paid the loss to the insured is entitled to be subrogated. This would mean that the insurer should get any amount that the insured is entitled from the carrier by way of damages for its negligence.<sup>60</sup>

A claim for compensation for use and occupation against a tenant holding over has been held to be one sound in damages and, therefore, not transferable.<sup>61</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that where the testator executed a will which sought to convey to the legatee 'the right to plead the said case' and 'the right to all debts and credits as may be decided by the courts', the testator not only sought to transfer the mere right to represent her case in the pending litigation to the legatee, but had also given the legatee her interest in the subject-matter of the litigation and hence, permissible in law.<sup>62</sup>

Where a minor transfers the property unauthorisedly sold by his guardian, the minor does not transfer a mere right to sue.<sup>63</sup> Considering the question whether a transferee from a minor after he attained majority, can file a suit to set aside the alienation made by the minor's guardian, the Supreme Court held that the right transferred by the minor after he attained majority was an interest in property which was capable of enforcement at the instance of the purchaser in the same way in which it was at the instance of the ex-minor prior to transfer in view of s 8(3) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act 1956. Such a provision, intended specially for the protection of the interests of the minor, must be read in harmony and consistency with the general provisions contained in s 6 of the TP Act.<sup>64</sup> In the instant case, on the facts, the transfer of the property made by the guardian was a voidable transaction and it was, therefore, open to the minor to challenge it and seek recovery of possession. Such a right of minor is a right or interest in property which he himself or 'any person claiming under him' as defined in s 8 (3) of the Guardianship Act may enforce by instituting a suit. 'Any person claiming under him' must necessarily include a purchaser.<sup>65</sup>

A right to obtain the reconveyance of property is a right to property and may be transferred.<sup>66</sup>

(21) Transfer of Mesne Profits, Rents etc

On the other hand, a person may have a right to sue by virtue of ownership of property transferred to him. A transfer of a mining lease along with an assignment of a contract of indemnity pertaining to the premises demised, is not hit by this clause.<sup>67</sup> On the same principle, a bare right to sue for mesne profits cannot be assigned, as mesne profits are unliquidated damages, and not a debt.<sup>68</sup> So also an attachment of profits which had not become due was held to be an attachment of a mere right to sue which could not be the subject-matter of sale,<sup>69</sup> but if a sale of land is accompanied with an assignment of mesne profits already accrued due, the assignment is valid,<sup>70</sup> but not otherwise.<sup>71</sup> This distinction was not noticed in a case decided by Madras High Court,<sup>72</sup> but it was pointed out in clear terms in a later case.<sup>73</sup> So also a transfer of land with rents already accrued due is valid.<sup>74</sup> The Patna High Court has held that a transferee of land and of mesne profits already accrued due, cannot maintain a suit for the mesne profits as such profits are damages, and not a debt.<sup>75</sup> It is submitted that this is erroneous and ignores effect of the word 'mere' which limits the prohibition to transferees which purport to transfer nothing, but the right to sue.<sup>76</sup> The chief court of Oudh has held that the transferee of a debt may sue to recover the debt, but not for interest before the assignment claimed by way of damages under s 73 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.<sup>77</sup>

If a guardian sells the property of a minor in fraud of the rights of the minor, the minor may on attaining majority sue to set aside the sale. It was held by the High Courts of Bombay, Orissa and Calcutta that until the sale is set aside the property does not belong to the minor, and if he sells it, the sale is a transfer of a mere right of suit and invalid.<sup>78</sup> The Supreme Court has now held that the transfer made by the father during his son's minority was voidable at the instance of his son who was the real owner, and any person purchasing such property from the natural guardian obtained only a defeasible title. The minor retained a right in the property to defeat existing adverse claim, and such right is an assignable right.<sup>79</sup> On the other hand, if a manager of a joint hindu family sells joint family property without necessity, it has been held that a coparcener has still an interest in the property which he can sell without suing to set aside the manager's sale, and that the coparcener's sale is a transfer of property with an incidental right of suit.<sup>80</sup>

(22) Mere Right to Sue Distinguished from Actionable Claim

An actionable claim is property, and the assignee has a right to sue to enforce the claim.<sup>81</sup> B cannot sue for a debt due to A, nor can A assign to B the right to sue for the debt due to A. But if A assigns the debt to B, then B may sue to recover it as a debt due to himself. A right of contribution is not a mere right to sue, but is an actionable claim which may be assigned.<sup>82</sup> The assignment of differences on cross contracts has been held to be valid as an assignment of a debt or an actionable claim, and not of a mere right to sue.<sup>83</sup>

However, a debt or actionable claim must be distinguished from a right to sue for damages. After a breach of contract for the sale of goods, nothing is left but a right to sue for damages which cannot be transferred.<sup>84</sup> But before breach, the benefit of an executory contract for the sale of goods may generally be transferred, and the buyer has the right to sue for the goods.<sup>85</sup> A right to mesne profits is a mere right to sue which cannot be transferred.<sup>86</sup>

The right to the profits of a village actually accrued due at the date of the transfer, is a debt which may be assigned.<sup>87</sup> If a certain sum of money is due from a person, that sum of money is recoverable on assignment even though a calculation may be necessary to determine the exact amount,<sup>88</sup> and the right to recover a definite amount in the hands of an agent may be assigned.<sup>89</sup> So also a right to a sum of money found due on taking an account is assignable.<sup>90</sup> As to whether the right to recover such money as may be found due on taking an account from an agent can be assigned, the cases are conflicting. In some cases it has been held that such an assignment is not of a mere right to sue, but of money belonging to the principal which is in the agent's hands, and that it is a debt although the amount remains to be ascertained.<sup>91</sup> In others, it has been held that the assignment is a mere right to sue the agent for failure to pay.<sup>92</sup> The distinction between a transfer of a mere right to sue and a transfer of an actionable claim is well illustrated by the Privy Council case quoted in illust (1) below.

Illustrations

(1) A's lessee had covenanted to pay the government assessment or in default to be liable to A in damages. A sold the reversion to B and also assigned to B his right to recover from the lessee certain installments of assessment which he had paid owing to the lessee's default. The High Court held the assignment to be void as an assignment of a mere right to sue. But the Privy Council held that the lessee's failure to pay did not give rise to a claim for damages within the meaning of the clause in the lease, but a claim for reimbursement of the precise sum A had paid to meet the obligation. It was therefore valid as an assignment of an actionable claim.<sup>93</sup>

(2) A agrees to sell to D a certain quantity of gunny bags deliverable on a future day. There are no circumstances of a personal character in the contract. Before the due date B assigns his beneficial interest in the contract to C. Thereafter, A commits a breach of the contract. This is not an assignment of a mere right to sue but of an actionable claim and is valid. C is entitled to sue for damages for not delivering the gunny bags.<sup>94</sup>

Other instances of transfers valid as transfers of an actionable claim are the transfer of the benefit of a contract to reconvey land,<sup>95</sup> the transfer by a dispossessed mortgagee of his right to recover his mortgage money;<sup>96</sup> a partner's unascertained interest in a dissolved partnership;<sup>97</sup> a transfer of a right to recover back the price paid on failure of the vendor to deliver possession;<sup>98</sup> an assignment to the insurer who has paid a claim for short delivery of goods during carriage of all rights of the consignor against the carrier.<sup>99</sup> In a case of High Court of Bombay,<sup>1</sup> a partner A released his share in the partnership to his partners and then assigned his share to B. A alleged that the release to his partners had been obtained by fraud. The court held that what was assigned to B was A's right to sue to set aside the release on the ground of fraud, and that such a right could not be assigned. A right to the income of property payable to a beneficiary under a settlement may be assigned. It is not a mere right of suit even though further inquiry is necessary to determine the amount.<sup>2</sup>

(23) Transfer of Decree

A decree is neither an actionable claim, nor a mere right of suit. When a claim has merged in a judgment and has been decreed, it is no longer a right to sue, and is assignable as a decree although the original cause of action was not assignable. Thus, a decree for mesne profits may be validly assigned.<sup>3</sup>

(24) Transfer of a Mere Right to Sue and Public Policy

The assignment of a right to sue is as much opposed to public policy as is gambling in litigation. Gambling in litigation is forbidden as opposed to public policy, and when such agreements are extortionate or oppressive,<sup>4</sup> they are not enforced, though compensation for legitimate expenses may properly be awarded.<sup>5</sup> In the undenoted case,<sup>6</sup> the Privy Council condemned the practice of the official assignee selling land which was in possession of a person who claimed to have purchased from the insolvent, as being in substance if not in form nothing more than the sale of a right to litigate. On the other hand, if the transaction is made bona fide with the object of assisting a claim believed to be just, a present transfer by a person who is not in possession, and who has not yet established title thereto is not invalid.<sup>7</sup> Both in England,<sup>8</sup> and in India,<sup>9</sup> a bona fide transfer of the fruits of an action is not illegal, for such an assignment is an assignment of future property.

(25) Insurance

It is provided in the Marine Insurance Act 1963 that this clause is not to affect ss 17, 52, 53 and 79 of that Act. Those sections provide for assignment of marine insurance policies, rights of subrogation, etc.

(26) Clause (f)--Transfer of Public Office

A public office is analogous to the case in cl (d), for a public office is held for qualities personal to the incumbent. A public servant is defined in the Indian Penal Code 1860 and a public officer in the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, but there is no definition in TP Act. In Henley v Lyme Corporation,<sup>10</sup> it was said that 'every one who is appointed to discharge a public duty, and receives a compensation in whatever shape, whether from the Crown or otherwise, is constituted a public officer.'

It is opposed to public policy that a public officer should transfer the salary of his office, for the salary is given for the purpose of upholding its dignity and the proper performance of its duties.<sup>11</sup> In Grenfell v The Dean and Conors of Windsor,<sup>12</sup> MR Lord Langdale said:

There are various cases in which public duties are concerned, in which it may be against public policy that the income arising for the performance of those duties should be assigned; and for this simple reason, because the public is interested, not only in the performance from time to time of the duties, but also in the fit state of preparation of the party having to perform them.

The percentage a khot receives for collecting assessment is not salary.<sup>13</sup>

Cases in India have arisen generally with reference to religious and village offices.<sup>14</sup> An assignment of a gratuity payable to the legal representative of a public officer is not prohibited.<sup>15</sup> If there is a doubt as to who is the proper incumbent, a compromise of the dispute is not contrary to public policy.<sup>16</sup> A railway servant cannot agree to the attachment of a part of his salary.<sup>17</sup> It has, however, been held that a transfer of the turn of worship and the right to recover offerings is valid, though such office may be held to be a public office.<sup>18</sup>

It has been held by the Madras High Court,<sup>19</sup> that an agreement by which a person agreed to pay a certain proportion of his income to his brother in consideration for his having been maintained and educated by the latter was not hit by this clause merely because that person subsequently became a government servant; the amount agreed to be paid could be paid from his savings or any other source, and the court held that it did not amount to the transfer of a public office.

(27) Clause (g)--Transfer of Pensions

Civil and military pensions are non-transferable, and are also exempt from attachment under s 60(g) of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. There are similar provisions in The Pensions Act 1871. In Secretary of State v Khemchand Jeychand,<sup>20</sup> J Melville said that the ordinary and well-known meaning of a pension was 'a periodical allowance or stipend granted, not in respect of any right, privilege, perquisite, or office, but on account of past services or particular merits or as compensation to dethroned princes, their families, and dependants.' An allowance granted for other considerations is not within the prohibition and can be assigned.<sup>21</sup> Thus, a toda giras hak which is an allowance paid to girassias for police services is not a political pension.<sup>22</sup>

A pension is a periodical payment of money by the government,<sup>23</sup> and a bonus or a reward is not a pension.<sup>24</sup> A grant of land or of land revenue even though in lieu of pension is not a pension and is, therefore, transferable;<sup>25</sup> though the Lahore High Court held that a pension may take the form of an assignment of land revenue.<sup>26</sup> An allowance made in lieu of a presumed grant of lands is not a pension.<sup>27</sup> There is no presumption that a jagir is a political pension.<sup>28</sup>

A pension which the Government of India has by treaty with another sovereign power guaranteed to pay, a political pension in its strictest sense;<sup>29</sup> and so is an allowance paid to a political prisoner, although the allowance is collected by the Government of India from a foreign state.<sup>30</sup> Other instances of political pensions are allowances granted to the 'Candyans pensioners' of Ceylon;<sup>31</sup> to the members of the Mysore family;<sup>32</sup> and to descendants of the Nawab of the Carnatic.<sup>33</sup>

A pension retains its character as long as it is unpaid and in the hands of government, but as soon as it is paid to the pensioner or his legal representative or agent it can be attached or transferred.<sup>34</sup>

The prohibition does not apply to private pensions, and pensions granted to railway servants can be attached and sold.<sup>35</sup>

In all probability this clause does not apply to pensions payable by a foreign state when remitted to a pensioner in India.<sup>36</sup> What is provided by cl (g) of s 6 is that stipends allowed to military, naval, air-force and civil pensioners of government and political pensioners, cannot be transferred. What is made non-transferable is, therefore, stipend paid to civil pensioners, and not to pension of civil pensioners.<sup>37</sup>

(28) Clause (h)

Previous clauses have defined the kinds of property that cannot be transferred, but the scope of this clause is difficult to define. Sub-cl (1) seems to state the self-evident proposition that what cannot be transferred is not transferable.

Sub-cl (3) states the equally self-evident proposition that there cannot be a transfer without a transferee. Sub-cl (2) states that:

no transfer can be made for an unlawful object or consideration within the meaning of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act.

These words mean that the law does not recognise such a transfer. In other words, when such a transfer is made, the courts will give no assistance either to the transferor to revoke it, or to the transferee to enforce it. It has been held that s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 does not prohibit enforcement of a valid portion of the transfer of property or debt, if it is severable from the invalid portion. Thus, where a part of the mortgage debt was invalid because it was hit by sub-s (2) of s 54-A of the Companies Act 1913 read with s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, it was held that the invalid portion of the consideration of the mortgage was severable, and the plaintiff-corporation was not entitled to recover the same.<sup>38</sup> If the contract of tenancy is hit by s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, the 'lease' resulting from such a contract will be void in view of s 6(h) of the TP Act.<sup>39</sup>

(29) Sub-clause (1) of Clause h--Opposed to the Nature of the Interest

Res communis which belongs to nobody, such as light, air and water of rivers of the sea would be things which, from their very nature, cannot be transferred. Things dedicated to public or religious uses are classed as res extra commercium which cannot be bought or sold.<sup>40</sup> Regalia, heirlooms, and debutter property<sup>41</sup> are, therefore, inalienable. A transfer of a service inam has been held to be void as opposed to the nature of the interest affected, and also as opposed to public policy.<sup>42</sup> Similarly, shebaitsip is not property which is capable of being disposed off.<sup>43</sup> The test is whether the service-holder has placed himself beyond the reach of his income, whether by a sale or a mortgage or by a lease under which he receives no periodical payments. So a lease of such property yielding an annual rent would be valid, though such a lease for a premium may be void.<sup>44</sup> An alienation of standing crops on such land is, therefore, valid.<sup>45</sup> Most of the cases referred to under cl (d) and (dd) would fall under this sub-clause.

(30) Sub-clause (2) of Clause h--Consideration

These are the words used in s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. They are disjunctive, as 'object' means purpose or design. An assignment for a money consideration to defeat the provisions of the Insolvency Act is for a valid consideration, but it is for an unlawful object.<sup>46</sup> On the other hand, a transfer of property to a prostitute for future cohabitation is a transfer for a consideration which is unlawful as it is immoral.<sup>47</sup> A distinction must, however, be made between the consideration for a transfer, and its motive; in Nagaratnamba v Ramayya,<sup>48</sup> the Supreme Court held that a transfer motivated by the fact that the transferor and transferee had cohabited was without consideration, and was, therefore, a gift. Such a transfer is not hit by s 6(h). The Supreme Court approved Belo v Parbat<sup>49</sup> in which a mortgage said to be in consideration of past cohabitation was held not to be hit by s 6(h), but observed that strictly speaking, past cohabitation was only the motive. However, it would be otherwise when the transfer was in the form of a gift and illicit cohabitation was the motive, and not an object or consideration.<sup>50</sup>

Where object or consideration partly lawful and partly unlawful--

The TP Act contains no provision corresponding to s 24 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, with reference to a transfer which is partly lawful and partly unlawful. A transfer of occupancy land is (except in certain circumstances) void under the Agra Tenancy Act 2 of 1901, but a transfer of lands comprising both zamindari land and inalienable occupancy land has been held to be valid as to the zamindari land.<sup>51</sup> The cases decided by Allahabad High Court are not consistent, and are cited in the judgment of J Mukerji in Dip Narain Singh v Nageshar.<sup>52</sup>

Where possession delivered under an unlawful transfer--

Transfers for an unlawful object or consideration are void, but if possession has been given in pursuance of a transfer that is void for this reason, the general rule is in pari delicio polior est condition possidentis, and the transferor cannot recover the property he has professed to transfer.<sup>53</sup> In such a case, the court would not act, but would say 'let the estate lie where it falls'.<sup>54</sup> Where, however, the transferee sues to obtain possession, the court will allow the defendant, ie, the transferor, to set up the plea of fraud; in such case, considerations of public policy demand that the issue be agitated. If the court finds fraud established, the court will let the property stay where it lies. Adopting any other course would have the effect of acting upon an instrument which is void ab initio.<sup>55</sup> Section 6(h) does not annul this rule of law, but only lays down that the court will not enforce a transfer which will have the effect of carrying out an unlawful object.<sup>56</sup> To this general rule that the court will not interfere, there are three exceptions which are enumerated in s 84 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882 which is as follows:

Where the owner of property transfers it to another for an illegal purpose and such purpose is not carried into execution, or the transferor is not as guilty as the transferee, or the effect of permitting the transferee to retain the property might be to defeat the provisions of any law, the transferee must hold the property for the benefit of the transferor.

In the first case mentioned in s 84 of Indian Trusts Act 1882, there is a locus paenitentiae until the fraud is carried out, and the transferor may sue to recover his property.<sup>57</sup> The second case is where the transferor is not as guilty as the transferee. In the analogous case of contract, s 27(l)(h) of the Specific Relief Act 1963 allows a contract to be rescinded if the defendant is more to blame than the plaintiff. The third case is where permitting the transferee to retain the property would defeat the provisions of any law, eg a transfer which would have the effect of withdrawing the property from the transferor's creditors, and so defeating the law of insolvency.<sup>58</sup> An exhaustive examination of the case law on this point by J Tekchand will be found in a case decided by Lahore High Court,<sup>59</sup> where a possessory mortgage which contravened the provisions of the Punjab Land Alienation Act 1900, because the mortgagee was a non-agriculturist, was executed benami in favour of an agriculturist. The benamidar sued to recover possession, but his suit was dismissed, and the court held that the mortgagors were entitled to show the real nature of the transaction, and differed from a dictum of Sir Lawrence Jenkins that 'a deed cannot be avoided on the ground of fraud by a party to the fraud'.<sup>60</sup>

Where transfer is ultra vires--

Contracts which are ultra vires are not necessarily illegal.<sup>61</sup> A contract which is ultra vires of a company is void not because it is illegal, but because the company has no power to enter into it.<sup>62</sup> A company may be entitled to recover money lent notwithstanding that the loan was ultra vires. In Turner v Bank of Bombay,<sup>63</sup> the bank was held to be entitled to recover on an equitable mortgage despite the prohibition in s 37 of the Presidency Banks Act, and in Ahmed Sail v Bank of Mysore,<sup>64</sup> a bank was held entitled to enforce a mortgage although its memorandum of association prohibited loans on mortgage.

(31) Section 23 of Contract Act

Under s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, a consideration or object is unlawful if (1) it is forbidden by law; or (2) is of such nature that it defeats the provisions of any law; or (3) is fraudulent; or (4) involves or implies injury to the person or property of another; (5) or the courts regard it as immoral or (6) opposed to public policy. The following are instances of transfers invalid under these heads:

Transfers of granted lands in contravention of the terms of the grant or in breach of any law; rule or regulation covering such grant will clearly be voidable. Legislature may provide that transfer of such granted lands will be void and not merely voidable, eg s 4(1) of Karnataka Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prohibition of Transfer of Certain Lands) Act 1978.<sup>65</sup>

(1) Forbidden by law--

A sub-lease of a farm for the retail sale of opium is void, as the sale of opium without a licence by the Collector is forbidden by the Opium Act.<sup>66</sup> Transfers of occupancy land have been held to be void as being forbidden by s 9 of the North-Western Provinces Act 1878,<sup>67</sup> or by s 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act 1901.<sup>68</sup>

Forbidden by law does not refer to prohibition by agreement, or decree of court.<sup>69</sup>

(2) Defeat the provisions of any law --

The following are such transfers:

A collusive assignment to a relation in expectation of insolvency to defeat the provisions of the Insolvency Act;<sup>70</sup> a lease granted by a mortgage under a mortgage forbidden by the Agra Tenancy Act, as the recognition of the lease would defeat the provisions of the Act;<sup>71</sup> a lease granted with the object of defeating the provisions of the Calcutta Rent Act;<sup>72</sup> a transfer by an insolvent to a creditor on condition of his not opposing his final discharge;<sup>73</sup> a sale-deed by an accused person to his pleader by way of indemnity for a bail bond executed by the pleader, for the indemnity renders the bail illusory.<sup>74</sup>

Illustration

A owes money to B and executes a hathchitta in favour of B promising to repay the debt. B in expectation of being adjudged insolvent assigns the hathchitta to his relation C in order to prevent the debt vesting in the Official Assignee. B is adjudged insolvent but the adjudication is subsequently annulled. Nevertheless, as the Assignment was made for an illegal purpose it is void and C cannot recover the debt.<sup>75</sup>

(3) Fraudulent--

A transfer to an agent in consideration of the agent granting a lease of land without the knowledge of his principal would be a fraud on the principal and void.<sup>76</sup>

(4) Injury to person or property--

A payment to a Hindu father in consideration of his giving his son in adoption is void, for the adoption is liable to be set aside and the son would lose his status in both families.<sup>77</sup>

(5) Immoral--

A lease of a house for use as a brothel is void as the purpose is immoral,<sup>78</sup> but not if the lessor was not aware of the intended use.<sup>79</sup> A transfer of immovable property to a woman in consideration of future illicit intercourse is void;<sup>80</sup> but if the immoral purpose has been carried out the transfer cannot be set aside.<sup>81</sup> On the same principle, a bequest in a will conditional on the continuance of immoral relations is void.<sup>82</sup> A distinction must be made between the motive for a transaction and its purpose;<sup>83</sup> a transfer motivated by the transferor and transferee having cohabited in the past is without consideration and is, therefore, a gift, and is not illegal.<sup>84</sup>

(6) Public policy--

A corrupt payment such as a bribe paid to an official is an instance of a transfer void as opposed to public policy.<sup>85</sup> It is contrary to public policy to stifle a prosecution.<sup>86</sup> In a case of Calcutta High Court,<sup>87</sup> the relations of a prisoner executed a mortgage in favour of the prisoner's employer for a large part of the employer's money which the prisoner had misappropriated, in consideration of the employer agreeing not to object to the prosecution being withdrawn by the commissioner of police. The court held that the mortgage was valid, but it is clear from the judgment that the mortgage would have been invalid, if the consideration had been that the employer should himself withdraw the prosecution. The Lahore High Court has held that the purchase by apulwara of land within his circle would create an interest in conflict with his duty, and would be void as contrary to public policy.<sup>88</sup> The judgments of the Allahabad High Court on the same point have been conflicting.<sup>89</sup> A transfer of land, granted revenue, free upon a condition that the grantees and their descendants should give blessings to the Maharaja of Nepal, is not contrary to public policy.<sup>90</sup> Payments to a father or guardian in consideration of a daughter or ward being given in marriage have been held to be opposed to public policy.<sup>91</sup> It is now understood that the doctrine of public policy will not be extended beyond the classes of cases already covered by it. No court can invent a new head of public policy;<sup>92</sup> it has been said in the House of Lords that 'public policy is always an unsafe and treacherous ground for legal decision'.<sup>93</sup>

(32) Sub-clause (3)--Disqualified to be a Transferee

A transfer is defined in s 5 as an act by which one person transfers property to another. It is, therefore, necessary that the transferor should be competent to transfer as enacted in s 7; and that the transferee should be competent to be transferee as enacted in this section. Any living person is competent to be a transferee, provided he is not subject to a legal disqualification. Such a disqualification is enacted in s 136 which forbids a judge, legal practitioner or officer connected with a court from purchasing an actionable claim. Similarly, o 21, r 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, forbids any officer or person having any duty to perform in connection with any sale from acquiring an interest in the property sold.

Minor as transferee--

A minor is in English law disqualified to be a transferee of a legal estate in land, but not of an equitable interest in and or other property;<sup>94</sup> but in India although a minor's contract is void,<sup>95</sup> yet a minor is not disqualified to be a transferee<sup>96</sup> and a minor may be a purchaser,<sup>97</sup> or a mortgagee.<sup>98</sup> However, neither the guardian of a minor, nor his manager is competent to bind the minor or his estate by a contract for the purchase of immovable property.<sup>99</sup> A lease to a minor is void, as a lease imports a covenant by the minor to pay rent and other reciprocal obligations.<sup>1</sup> This was so decided before the amending Act 20 of 1929, and the present s 107 makes it clear that a lease to a minor must be void because it must be executed both by the lessor and the lessee.

Executive instructions requiring an official certificate of approval to a transfer do not render a person, who does not hold such certificate, legally disqualified to be a transferee.<sup>2</sup> A Buddhist monk is not disqualified to be a transferee.<sup>3</sup>

(33) Clause (i)--Untransferable Right of Occupancy

This clause was added by the amending Act 3 of 1885, and is identical with the proviso to s 108(j) exempting certain holdings from the general rule that leaseholds are transferable. In this section, it is also an exception to the general rule that property is transferable.

Some occupancy rights are inalienable either by custom or by local laws such as the North-Western Provinces Rent Act 1878, or the Agra Tenancy Act 1901.<sup>4</sup> In Motichand v Ikram Ullah,<sup>5</sup> the Privy Council said that the policy of the Tenancy Act, was to preserve proprietary rights from being transferred otherwise than by gift or by exchange between co-sharers, and that the Act was not to be defeated by ingenious devices or arrangements such as an arrangement to relinquish. Under that Act and under the Oudh Rent Act 1886, a proprietor, whose proprietary rights are transferred to an outsider, is entitled to retain possession of his sir or home farm lands at a reduced statutory rent as an exproprietary tenant. In the undernoted case,<sup>6</sup> a proprietor was held to be entitled to this exproprietary tenancy although the rents of the sir lands had been assigned for payment of a maintenance allowance, and although the effect of the exproprietary tenancy was to reduce the amount of that allowance. The rents paid by the cultivators was received by the exproprietary tenant and the person entitled to the maintenance allowance, received only the reduced statutory rent from the exproprietary tenant. A mortgage of an occupancy holding is void under s 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act, and the mortgage is not entitled even to sue for a money decree on the basis of a personal covenant in the mortgage.<sup>7</sup>

Under the law as it stood before the TP Act, tenancies whether of homestead lands or of agricultural lands in Bengal were not transferable in the absence of a custom to the contrary, or of an express contract to that effect.<sup>8</sup> Section 2 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (Bengal Act 8 of 1885) enacts that every permanent tenure is (subject to the provisions of the Act) capable of being transferred. Tenures created after the TP Act and before the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act are transferable.<sup>9</sup> Non-permanent tenures created before the passing of the TP Act are not transferable.<sup>10</sup> By s 26B of the Bengal Tenancy Act as amended by Bengal Act 4 of 1928, the holding of an occupancy ryot in Bengal is, subject to the provisions of the Act, capable of being transferred like other immovable property. The landlord is entitled to evict as a trespasser a mortgagee of a holding that is not transferable, if the tenant has abandoned his holding.<sup>11</sup> Under s 87 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, a landlord is entitled to re-enter when a ryot abandons his holding. If a tenant of a non-transferable holding executes a usufructuary mortgage of his holding and leaves the village, the holding is abandoned and the landlord is entitled to treat the mortgagee as a trespasser.<sup>12</sup> If a co-sharer landlord purchases a non-transferable holding and takes possession, the transaction is an abandonment of the holding, and the purchasing landlord is a trespasser as to the shares of the other landlord.<sup>13</sup> This is also the case when the purchase is made by a stranger who afterwards acquires a share in the landlord's right.<sup>14</sup> A tenant with a right of occupancy under s 36 of the Oudh Rent Act 1886, or a statutory tenant under s 5 of the said Act has a non-transferable right of occupancy which he can relinquish by the procedure of s 50 of the Act.

Transfers of agricultural lands have been restricted or prohibited by Tenancy and other agrarian legislation.<sup>15</sup>

Persons competent to transfer

--Every person competent to contract and entitled to transferable property, or authorized to dispose off transferable property not his own, is competent to transfer such property either wholly or in part, and either absolutely or conditionally, in the circumstances, to the extent and in the manner, allowed and prescribed by any law for the time being in force.

(1) Competent to Transfer

Under s 6(h)(3), any person is competent to be a transferee, unless legally disqualified. This section deals with the competency of a transferor. The transferor must be--

- (1) competent to contract; and
- (2) have title to the property, or authority to transfer it if not his own.

(2) Competent to Contract

This is the same condition as is enacted by s 7 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882 for the creation of a trust. Section 11 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 defines capacity to contract as follows:

Every person is competent to contract who is of the age of majority according to the law to which he is subject, and who is of sound mind, and is not disqualified from contracting by any law to which he is subject.

The power to transfer must depend upon the power to contract, for without an antecedent contract to give and take, there can be no transfer at all.

(3) Minor as a Transferor

The transferor must have attained the age of majority according to the law to which he is subject. The Privy Council have held that a contract by a minor is void.<sup>16</sup> A transfer by a minor, therefore, is also void.<sup>17</sup> Prior to the decision of the Privy Council, it was generally assumed that a minor's contract was voidable, and could be ratified. These decisions are now obsolete, and as the contract is void there can be no question of ratification. There are many conflicting decisions as to whether a minor can be estopped by a false representation that he is of age. Before the Privy Council decision that a minor is incapable of contracting, Ameer Ali J said that the rule of estoppel was not applicable, as it would have the effect of enlarging the minor's power to contract.<sup>18</sup> This is supported by a dictum of the Privy Council in Mahomed Syedol Arifin v Yeoh,<sup>19</sup> that the doctrine of estoppel is only applicable to persons who are sui juris, and by the English cases of Leslie Ltd v Sheill<sup>20</sup> and Levine v Brougham.<sup>21</sup> A Full Bench of the Lahore High Court has after a review of the case law come to the same conclusion.<sup>22</sup> In Sadiq Ali Khan v Jai Kishore,<sup>23</sup> the Privy Council observed that a deed executed by a minor was a nullity and incapable of founding a plea of estoppel, and following this decision, a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has overruled its previous decisions to the contrary.<sup>24</sup> The principle underlying the decision of the Privy Council is that there can be no estoppel against a statute.

Although a minor is not competent to be a transferor, yet a transfer to a minor is valid.<sup>25</sup>

(4) Lunatic as a Transferor

Under s 12 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, a person is of sound mind for the purpose of making a contract if he is capable of understanding it, and of forming a rational judgment as to its effect upon his interests.<sup>26</sup> A contract made by a lunatic is void under s 11 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and so also, a transfer by him of his property is void.<sup>27</sup> A lunatic is competent to contract during a lucid interval, and a transfer by a lunatic during a lucid interval would be valid here as in England.<sup>28</sup> However, a person adjudged a lunatic would be incapable of making a transfer even during a lucid interval.<sup>29</sup> The unsoundness of mind may be established by proving such conduct as was not in keeping with the character of the person concerned, but such that it could not be explained on any reasonable basis. Burden to prove or establish at least on a balance of probability the transferor's action in executing transfer deed in favour of transferee was the outcome of an unsound mind, is on the person alleging so. However, unrebutted evidence of an unnatural and inexplicable animosity as well as unnatural and inexplicable fixation on selling of all his properties probabilises that the sale was effected by the transferor when he was incapable of rational behaviour. The onus then shifts to the transferee to adduce evidence either to show that the ostensibly irrational conduct of the transferee had a rational explanation, or that the conveyance was executed by the transferor in a lucid interval.<sup>30</sup>

Disqualified to contract

A statutory disqualification to contract imports, as in the case of a minor, inability to transfer. Such a disqualification ensues when the owner's property is under the management of the Court of Wards,<sup>31</sup> or of an officer appointed under Encumbered Estates Act.<sup>32</sup> A judgment debtor whose property is being sold in execution by the Collector is also incompetent to alienate.<sup>33</sup>

Authority to dispose off property

If the transferor has no title to the property, he must have authority to transfer it.<sup>34</sup> Also, a person holding limited estate is not competent to transfer.<sup>35</sup> As instances of authority to transfer the property of another, the following may be cited--an agent acting under a power of attorney; the donee of a power of appointment; the guardian of a minor duly authorised by the court in that behalf; the manager of a Hindu family in case of necessity or for the benefit of the family; the committee or manager of a lunatic<sup>36</sup>; a receiver when empowered by the court; an executor or administrator having authority to dispose off the property of the deceased regulated by s 307 of the Indian Succession Act 1925.

In all these cases, the authority is defined and limited by personal and statutory laws which are outside the scope of TP Act. The extent of the power of transfer depends upon the interest of the transferor or the limitation upon his authority. However, whether the power of transfer is limited or absolute, all transfers are subject to the general rules enacted in this chapter.

An agent who merely manages property, has no authority to transfer it.<sup>37</sup>

Person not authorised to dispose off minor's property

Where the de facto guardian of the minor's property sells it, the sale is invalid, and will be hit by s 11 of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act. Even subsequent ratification by the natural guardian does not validate it.<sup>38</sup>

Operation of transfer

--Unless a different intention is expressed or necessarily implied, a transfer of property passes forthwith to the transferee all the interest which the transferor is then capable of passing in the property and in the legal incidents thereof.

Such incidents include, where the property is land, the easements annexed thereto, the rents and profits thereof accruing after the transfer, and all things attached to the earth; and, where the property is machinery attached to the earth, the movable parts thereof; and, where the property is a house, the easements annexed thereto, the rent thereof accruing after the transfer, and the locks, keys, bars, doors, windows, and all other things provided for permanent use therewith; and, where the property is a debt or other actionable claim, the securities thereof (except where they are also for other debts or claims not transferred to the transferee), but not arrears of interest accrued before the transfer; and, where the property is money or other property yielding income, the interest or income thereof accruing after the transfer takes effect.

(1) Transfer Passes All Interest of Transferor

Conveyancing in India has never been obscured by the technicalities of English law, and the rule that a conveyance is presumed to be a transfer of all the interest that the transferor is capable of passing, though not fully established in England till 1926, was recognised in India even before the passing of the TP Act. In a case to which the TP Act was not applicable, the Privy Council said that the rule before the TP Act was that words of grant were calculated to convey all the interest of the grantor, but that it was necessary to read the whole instrument in order to gather the intention.<sup>39</sup> Again in Syed Ashgar v Syed Mahomed,<sup>40</sup> Lord Lindley said with reference to the construction of a conveyance:

The deed of 1883 contains no words of exception or reservation, and is simple in point of language to pass all Syed Haider Reza's interest in the Zamindary, including the land on which the bazar was situated. His interest in the houses on that land, the profit and the rents derived from them, would pass by the deed in the absence of words showing an intention to retain them.

Therefore, where an owner of a grove sells the grove by declaring that he was selling it with every right that he possessed therein, it follows that his right to the land is also conveyed to the vendor, unless it is especially reserved by him.<sup>41</sup> Even if the actual possession of the property is not with the transferor, symbolic and de jure possession can be transferred for completing a grant.<sup>42</sup>

The section is a rule of construction which avoids speculation as to the particular interest which was in the mind of the transferor. If he holds under two titles, eg by purchase and by inheritance, or as part owner and as executor, it will be presumed that both the interests have passed.<sup>43</sup>

If the grantor has used unqualified words of conveyance, he cannot afterwards claim to have any rights in the property.<sup>44</sup> A zamindar mortgaged a taluka in some villages of which he had a sarabarakari interest subordinate to his zamindari right. The deed made no reference to the subordinate interest and in the absence of an express reservation, the mortgage was held to include the sarabarakari interest also.<sup>45</sup> This section is not intended to lay down any rule as to what words are necessary to effect a transfer of any particular kind of property. What property is actually conveyed by a particular kind of deed depends on its own terms.<sup>46</sup> Where, on a construction of a document transferring title to hold a property, it is clear that the intention of the parties was to transfer a parcel of land within well-defined boundaries, any erroneous statement of survey number or omission to state it should be rejected as false demonstration.<sup>47</sup> However, wherever there is any mis-description of the property, the real intention of the party has to be gathered from the surrounding circumstances as well as the sale deed. Though it is not an inexorable principle of law, but ordinarily, it is said that depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, whenever there is a conflict in the description of the property in a sale deed or any other instrument so far as plot number, khata number and boundaries are concerned, generally speaking, the boundaries are to prevail. Similar opinion was expressed by the Supreme Court in Sheodhyan Singh v Sanichara Kuer,<sup>48</sup> wherein it was held that whenever there is any mis-description ordinarily, the description as per the boundaries may be preferred to represent the correct intentions of the parties.<sup>49</sup>

With reference to s 8, it has been held that where there is a purported deed of adoption which fails as such deed, it can be treated as a will, if such an intention can be ascertained from the deed.<sup>50</sup>

It has been held by the Patna High Court that where there is a grant of a mining lease and a map is annexed to the grant showing an area lesser than what is stated in the grant, the terms of the grant must prevail over the map.<sup>51</sup>

Rajasthan High Court has held that where a person has purchased the plot of land from a private citizen who was the owner of the land and by such purchase of land, all the rights of the former owner have been transferred to the purchaser, the purchaser would be entitled to all the rights referred in s 8 and s 55(6)(a). Therefore, no conversion charges can be demanded by the government if the purchaser wants to change the use of land.<sup>52</sup>

(2) Where Transferor is Both Part Owner and Executor

An executor has the right to sell the property of the testator in due course of administration. If an executor is also one of the beneficiaries, and he sells the property of the testator together with 'all the estate, right, title and interest' of the vendor, the deed conveys the whole title vested in the executor, and not merely his beneficial interest, though he does not purport to convey in his capacity as executor.<sup>53</sup> If the executant had an absolute title, then, it has to be inferred that the executant conveyed his absolute title to the person in whose favour the document was executed.<sup>54</sup>

(3) Hindu Law

The Hindu law is the same, for under that law an absolute estate may be conveyed without the words of limitation formerly used in English law to convey an estate of inheritance; and whether the gift passes an absolute or a limited estate, depends upon the terms of the grant.<sup>55</sup> However, if the donee is a female relation who takes a limited estate in property inherited, the Privy Council in Mahomed Shumsool v Shewukram<sup>56</sup> held that the court is entitled to assume, where the property given is immovable, that the donor intended her to take a limited estate only, and in such cases it has been said that the principle of s 8 is not of much practical utility.<sup>57</sup> However, of course, an absolute estate may be conferred upon a woman by express words indicating full proprietary rights.<sup>58</sup> The use of the word malik imports an absolute heritable and alienable estate,<sup>59</sup> unless the context indicates a different meaning.<sup>60</sup> It was supposed at one time by some of the courts in India that, under the Hindu law, in case of immovable property given or devised by a husband to his wife, the wife had no power to alienate, unless the power of alienation was conferred upon her in express terms. However, it has been held by decisions of the Privy Council that the proposition was not sound, and that if words of sufficient amplitude were used conferring the absolute ownership upon the wife, the wife enjoyed the rights of ownership without their being conferred by express and additional terms, unless the circumstances or the context were sufficient to show that such absolute ownership was not intended.<sup>61</sup>

In the case of a transfer for consideration to a wife by a Hindu, the Privy Council applied s 8 even before the amendment of s 2, and held that the donee took an absolute estate.<sup>62</sup>

A person executed a settlement deed, transferring certain properties in favour of P and directed that the property shall be enjoyed by P and after her lifetime, by S. S and his widow G sued for possession of the properties settled in favour of P. It was held, that subject to the life interest of P, S (the husband of G) had been given absolute estate. The document did not show that P was given absolute interest. S, during his lifetime, acquired a vested right in the properties, which could not be defeated by his death before he obtained possession.<sup>63</sup>

Even in a family settlement, a restraint on alienation of the property is void. Sections 10 to 14 of the TP Act (and the corresponding provisions of the Indian Succession Act) are statutory recognitions of the principles, that to impose total restraint on transfer or to impose restrictions which keep the property out of circulation forever, offends public policy, irrespective of whether such conditions are imposed by a deed or transfer, a will, or a simple contract. A contract against public policy is void. Therefore, such restrictive clauses in a family settlement are inoperative.<sup>64</sup>

Even though the document may use the word 'surrender' and even though it may be styled as a 'release' yet, if it transfers all the right, title and interests of the person executing it in favour of person accepting it, then it is a sale, if executed for consideration.<sup>65</sup>

Where trust deeds conferring similar interest on grandsons in respect of properties of creators of trusts, were executed respectively by a male member and female member of a Hindu family, it was held that the principles of Hindu law governing the devolution of property in case of property passing from father to his son and grandsons, cannot be invoked in such a case.

In the above case, the trust deeds (i) gave properties of the executants of the deeds to grandsons in equal shares on the happening of a particular event; (ii) conferred, on the trustees, a right to exercise an absolute and uncontrolled discretion (on the death of a beneficiary before the happening of the event) to apply the beneficiary's share towards the maintenance of his widow and his male issue, and to accumulate the surplus to the account of the said beneficiary for distribution; and (iii) also provided, that if, before the time of division and distribution of properties, a beneficiary died, leaving only a widow, the widow would get a half of the share belonging to the deceased beneficiaries, and the heirs of other deceased beneficiaries. It was held that the above conditions were sufficient, in themselves, to lead to the conclusion that it was never intended that the properties should pass to the beneficiaries, to be held by them for their respective Hindu undivided families. On the plain terms of the trust deed, the properties were intended to devolve, on the beneficiaries in their individual capacity.<sup>66</sup> A settlement deed is not defined under the TP Act. It is disposition of the property either for the purpose of settling disputes among the family, or for religious purposes, or in consideration of marriage.<sup>67</sup>

(4) Court Sales

The section does not apply to court sales, for such sales effect a transfer by the operation of law.<sup>68</sup> The principle of the section was, however, applied in a case decided by Madras High Court<sup>69</sup> where a debt for unpaid purchase money on a sale of land was attached and sold, and the auction purchaser was held entitled to the charge which the vendor had under s 55(4)(b) on the property in the hands of the buyer. The court, after observing that the present section did not apply to court sales, said:

The effect of applying s 8 is to strengthen the sale certificate by transferring the lien along with it.

It is difficult to follow this line of reasoning, and these dicta have been treated as obiter in a later case,<sup>70</sup> wherein J Madhavan Nair said that s 8 could not override the provisions of the Registration Act 1908. It is submitted that s 8 cannot apply to court sales. What is sold at a court sale is the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor, and the extent of that interest is a mixed question of fact and law to be decided according to the circumstances of each particular case, and depends upon what the court intended to sell, and the purchaser intended to buy.<sup>71</sup> Thus, a court sale of a judgment debtor's interest in property which has been leased, passes rents accrued due at the time of sale, not because rents are incidental to the land, but because the rents were part of the judgment debtor's interest.<sup>72</sup> Similarly, an execution sale of a zamindari estate will pass buildings in the zamindari area which are appurtenant to the estate<sup>73</sup> and were, therefore, included in the sale, but not indigo factories which though in the estate are not appurtenant thereto.<sup>74</sup>

Revenue sales under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, 1859 stand on a different footing, for the interest of the defaulting proprietor in the land is forfeited or determined, and what is sold is the interest of the government subject to the payment of assessment.<sup>75</sup> Accordingly, if he has erected a building on the land, the right to the building would not pass, and he would be entitled to remove the materials, unless the purchaser elected to pay compensation for the building.<sup>76</sup> This is in accordance with the general rule laid down in the case of Thakoor Chunder v Ramdhone.<sup>77</sup>

(5) Different Intention

The general presumption is in favour of a transfer of all the interests of the transferor. A mortgages a mango tree standing on his land to B. A then sells the land to C, and the sale-deed makes no mention of the mortgage. It cannot be inferred that A's interest in the tree did not pass with the sale to C.<sup>78</sup>

The presumption of a transfer of all the interest can be rebutted by express words or by necessary implication. The words 'lease' and 'mortgage' of themselves express an intention of transferring an interest less than the transferor is capable of passing. The words 'mokarari lease with all rights' express the intention to pass all rights which can be passed by way of lease, but short of an absolute title and the lessee would take permanent lease, but not with subsoil rights in the minerals, for the essential characteristic of a lease is that the corpus does not disappear and minerals must be expressly denominated so as thus to permit the idea of partial consumption of the subject leased.<sup>79</sup>

The words of the document describing the property must be given due weight. Thus, where it is stated in the deed of settlement that the widow conveyed the property which had passed to her under her husband's will, and the will was invalid, being one executed by a Hindu who had a son living at the time, it cannot be argued that she conveyed also her interest in the property as heir of the son. The recitals showed that the intention was not to transfer all the interest which she was capable of passing, but only the interest acquired under her husband's will. Thus, the deed showed a 'different intention' within the meaning of s 8.<sup>80</sup>

Again, the circumstances of the case may be such as to disclose an intention to restrict the transfer to an interest under one title only. Thus, in Har Prasad v Fazal Ahmed,<sup>81</sup> a Mahomedan sold two villages to his mother, and left a substantial part of the purchase money with her to be spent in charity. On his death, the mother spent some money in charity and then settled the villages in wakf, subject to a charge for the amount actually paid plus the amount spent in charity. The sale was set aside as being merely a cloak for a gift in fraud of the heirs. The wakf fell with the sale, but it was contended that as the mother was entitled to a third share of the villages as heir to her son, the wakf was operative as to that third share. However, the Privy Council held that the reservation of a charge for what she had paid and spent, showed that the mother had no intention of settling anything of her own or anything except what she thought had been entrusted to her by her son.

An intention to reserve a right may be implied not only from the terms of the deed, but also from the object of the grant. Thus a gift of certain talukas 'in order that you may perform those religious ceremonies, celebrate the festivals satisfactorily and may provide for your own support by having the property under your authority and control' was held to confer a life-estate, the Privy Council observing that 'the indefinite words of the gift must be limited by the purpose of the gift'.<sup>82</sup> In a kharposh gift which is only a grant for life, an intention to reserve mineral rights is implied.<sup>83</sup> Where the proviso in a lease deed is void as it is unauthorised and the effect of declaring the proviso void will be to leave the rest of the deed whole and intact, the lease without the proviso is valid.<sup>84</sup> The different intention may be also to transfer an interest greater than the transferor possesses at the time, and if the property is sold free from encumbrances, the vendor is bound to discharge encumbrances then existing on the property.

(6) Legal Incidents

The second clause refers to land and defines what is included in its 'legal incidents'. An incident is defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon as 'a thing necessarily depending upon, appertaining to, or following another that is more worthy--as rent is incidental to a reversion.' The provisions as to legal incidents in the second, third, and fourth paras of this section correspond to s 6 of the Conveyancing and the Law of Property Act 1881,<sup>85</sup> where a more detailed list is given. The list in this section is not exhaustive as is shown by the use of the word 'includes'.

The following are the legal incidents which pass upon the transfer of property to which they relate:

The benefit of a covenant which runs with the land under s 55(2); or s 65; or s 108(c); a right under s 55(3) to possession of title deeds;<sup>86</sup> and a right of pre-emption.<sup>87</sup>

(7) Construction of Deeds

A document has to be construed as a whole. Real intention of the parties has to be gathered, not merely from what ex facie is stated as the description of the property in the schedule, but from the totality of the recitals in the document.

Description of the property in the schedule to the document could not be given any overriding importance over the actual area specified in the document as the extent of the land determined upon measurement.<sup>88</sup> The construction of a document as regards the legal effects will only arise where the document is an instrument of title, or is a contract, or is the direct foundation of legal rights. Where the nature and character of the document are clear, and the only question or dispute is whether the real contract is between the parties is something different from that contained in the document, no question of the construction of the document is involved. There can be no doubt that where the language is plain and unambiguous, the same is to be adhered to.<sup>89</sup> The construction of a document depends upon the language of the recitals, but not upon its form or nomenclature. The intention of the executant is to be gathered from the words used in the document. To find out whether a document is settlement, gift or a will, the nature of a document has to be examined whether it transferred any interest in property in praesenti, or after the death of the executant. A mere delivery of possession cannot amount to transfer of interest in the property.

(8) Easements Annexed Thereto

An 'easement' is defined in s 4 of the Indian Easements Act 1882.<sup>90</sup>

Under s 19 of the Indian Easements Act 1882, an easement existing at the date of the transfer passes with the dominant heritage to the transferee. A purchaser of a house acquires a right of way which the vendor has.<sup>91</sup> The illustration to s 19 of the Easements Act 1882 is that if A owns land to which a right of way is annexed and leases it to B for 20 years, the right of way would vest in B and his legal representatives for so long as the lease continues.

A purchaser of land irrigated by the water of a tank is entitled to use the water of the tank for irrigation.<sup>92</sup> The phrase 'easements annexed thereto' refers to those easements which at and prior to the transfer were existing easements. It does not refer to an easement which first came into existence as a consequence of transfer.

The words 'locks, keys, bars' refer to permanent fixtures and fittings. The words 'other thing provided' do not include a right of access by a staircase, when the ownership of the staircase itself is not claimed, and the right of way is not an easement of necessity.<sup>93</sup>

Apart from legal easements other rights called quasi-easements are created on the severance of property. As to these, s 13 of the Indian Easements Act 1882, enacts that on partition the grant of an easement of necessity or of an apparent continuous easement shall be implied. The word 'annexed' is used in the same sense as the word 'appurtenant' in English law,<sup>94</sup> and indicates that the right is the right of the owner for the time being. The right to a ferry franchise is not necessarily annexed to the land.<sup>95</sup>

Where a common passage was left for the use of the co-sharers in a partition between the members of one family, it was held that such an arrangement did not make the right to a share in the passage a legal incident of the shares allotted to co-sharers.<sup>96</sup>

A purchaser of land cannot claim use of water in a well constructed in a separate and distinct land. Transfer of property passes forthwith to the transferee all the interests, which the transferor is capable of passing in the property and the legal incidents thereof.<sup>97</sup> A decree for permanent injunction being one granted for protection of the decree-holder's statutory easementary right of way appurtenant to his dominant heritage and annexed with the servient tenement of the judgment-debtors, is enforceable in law against the transferee-judgment-debtor, he being the successor-in-interest of the original judgment-debtor.<sup>98</sup>

(9) Rents and Profits

Rents and profits accrue after the transfer of benefits arise out of the land and are, therefore, within the definition of immovable property. The rents and profits of property mortgaged by an English mortgage form part of the mortgagee's security.<sup>99</sup> A buyer's right to rents and profits, therefore, accrues on the date of the transfer. This is made clear by s 55(4)(a) under which the seller is entitled to the rents and profits of the property until ownership passes to the buyer, and also s 55(6)(a) which declares the buyer entitled to rents and profits when the ownership of the property passes to him. At a court sale, the property vests at the date of sale and so the auction purchaser is entitled to the crops grown between the date of sale and the date of confirmation of the sale.<sup>1</sup> If the vendor retains possession after the ownership has passed to the buyer, he may be charged for use and occupation. Rents and profits accruing due before the transfer are not legal incidents of the property transferred.<sup>2</sup> Such arrears of rent are a debt or an actionable claim, and if they are to be transferred, they must be assigned separately.<sup>3</sup>

(10) Attached to the Earth

This phrase is defined in s 3 of TP Act. What is attached to the earth is immovable property within the definition of the term in the General Clauses Act. What is attached to the earth is part of the land, and passes with it on transfer without express mention.<sup>4</sup> In the case of a lease, the right to enjoy the trees and shrubs passes to the lessee.<sup>5</sup> Trees on an occupancy holding, which is inalienable, are attached to the holding, and cannot be transferred by the occupancy holder.<sup>6</sup> A house, being embedded in the earth, is immovable property,<sup>7</sup> and when the land is transferred, buildings erected upon it pass by necessary implication.<sup>8</sup> It has been held by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, disapproving an earlier Allahabad judgment,<sup>9</sup> that it is a question of fact in each case whether the transfer of an interest in a zamindari also transfers an interest in a residential house.<sup>10</sup> It has also held that in case of an auction sale of only the land or a plot, the house built thereupon does not automatically get transferred by virtue of s 8.<sup>11</sup> However, an iron shed resting on the land by its own weight is not attached to the earth, and is a mere chattel which does not pass on transfer of the land.<sup>12</sup> All things which are annexed to the property mortgaged are part of the mortgagee's security, and the mortgage need not make mention of structures and fixtures.<sup>13</sup>

Unless a different intention is expressed, a transfer of land would include trees standing on it.<sup>14</sup> However, no transfer of land can be presumed from transfer of trees.<sup>15</sup> Failure to mention saplings in the agreement to sell the land, was held to indicate that they were not intended to be sold.<sup>16</sup>

(11) Minerals

Minerals are embedded in the earth, and pass on sale of the land. In Raja Anand v State of Uttar Pradesh,<sup>17</sup> the Supreme Court observed that prima facie the owner of the surface is entitled ex jure to everything beneath the land, and held that a transfer of the right to the surface conveys the right to the minerals underneath, unless there is an express or implied reservation in the grant. Whether a lease passes a right to sub-soil minerals depends on the terms of the grant.<sup>18</sup> A permanent lease by a Bengal zamindar does not imply a grant of mineral rights.<sup>19</sup> In Ali Quadar v Jogendra,<sup>20</sup> JJ Prinsep and Hill held that a grant of a patni taluka transfers mineral rights. The Judicial Committee intimated in one case that this decision had not been overruled,<sup>21</sup> and it has since been followed.<sup>22</sup> However, the point is now settled against the patnidar, for in Bejoy Singh Dudhorin v Surendra Narayan Singh<sup>23</sup> the Judicial Committee have held that even in the case of a patni tenure the onus is on the patnidar to prove the inclusion of subsoil rights in the grant. As between zamindar and jagirdar, it is well-settled that the zamindar must be regarded as the owner of the minerals.<sup>24</sup>

In Raja Anand v State of Uttar Pradesh State,<sup>25</sup> the Supreme Court applied the same general principle in construing a sanad granted by the government creating a zamindari and held that as the object was to make the zamindar the owner of the soil, he was entitled to the minerals. It is submitted that this decision was given on the peculiar facts of the case, and was based on the language of the particular sanad and the subsequent conduct of the parties, and does not affect the general principle stated in earlier editions of this work that if the grantor is the government, there is a presumption that mineral rights are reserved.

Shells--

An agricultural tenant may dig up shells for the purpose of cultivating his land, but has not the right to appropriate the shells to his own use.<sup>26</sup>

(12) Machinery as to the Third Clause

The section assumes that the machinery is attached to the earth and is, therefore, a fixture, and then enacts that the movable parts of the machine, although they are detachable, pass with the land and the fixed machine. This is an illustration of the principle stated by Lord Hardwicke in Lawton v Lawton<sup>27</sup> that 'you shall not destroy the principal thing, by taking away the accessory to it.'

(13) House

The fourth clause merely repeats in regard to a house what has already been enacted in the first and second clauses as to property generally. If the property transferred is a house, the easements annexed to it will also pass not only under this section, but also under s 19 of the Easements Act 1882. The transferee is also entitled to rents and profits accruing after the transfer. Locks, bars, keys doors and widows have no separate existence from the house.<sup>28</sup>

(14) Debts

The fifth clause relates to debts and other actionable claims. The transfer of a debt or actionable claim raises a presumption that the security for the debt has been transferred. The assignment of the debt will, unless a different intention is expressed or implied, draw the securities after it according to the maxim omne principale trahit ad accessorium.<sup>29</sup> The transfer of a debt passes all interest the transferor may have to recover the debt. A promissory note is sometimes described as a security for the debt, but the expression is inaccurate, for a promissory note if not itself the contract of loan, is a conditional payment of the debt. If a mortgagee holds a promissory note for a part of the debt, and retains it after transferring the mortgagee, he will be restrained from suing on it pending a suit for redemption.<sup>30</sup> However, a bona fide endorsee for value of the note without notice of the mortgage will be entitled to recover on it.<sup>31</sup> Where what is transferred is not the debt, but the property in the promissory note, the section does not apply.<sup>32</sup>

The question arose in a case before the Supreme Court<sup>33</sup> as to whether the transferee of the entire assets of a company including the right to continue a suit filed by the company obtained, by reason of s 8, the right to obtain a decree in the said suit. Justice Das, (as he then was) held that no decree was in existence at the date of transfer, and that s 8 was inapplicable as it only refers to property in existence at the time of transfer. Justice Bhagwati, who concurred in the result held, however, that in such cases there was, by the transfer of the debt, 'necessarily involved also, a transfer of the transferor's right in a decree which may be passed in his favour in pending litigation and the moment a decree is passed in his favour by the court of law, that decree is also automatically transferred in favour of the transferee by virtue of the assignment in writing already executed by the transferor.' Justice Imam who was the third Judge on the Bench, expressed no opinion on this point.<sup>34</sup>

The rule in this section is distinct from the doctrine of subrogation enacted in s 92 by which a co-debtor or a surety is subrogated to the creditor he has paid off. However, the exception made in the parenthesis is similar to that in the last para of s 92. For just as there is no subrogation when a mortgage is partially paid off, so there is no transfer of a security on the payment of a debt when the security covers other debts also.

(15) Mortgage Debts

Before mortgage debts were excluded from the definition of actionable claims, the assignment of the mortgage debt carried with it an assignment of the mortgage security.<sup>35</sup> However, since mortgage debts have been excluded from the definition by Act 2 of 1900, s 8 no longer applies, for the word 'debt' in this section must be confined to such debts as fall within the general definition of actionable claims.<sup>36</sup> A mortgage being immovable property can only be transferred by a registered instrument.<sup>37</sup>

In Perumal v Perumal,<sup>38</sup> CJ Wallis said that although a debt secured by a written mortgage could not be assigned without a registered deed, yet in the case of a promissory note secured by an equitable mortgage, the endorsement of the note operates to carry the security with it. The authorities cited were Cunniah v Gopala Chettiar<sup>39</sup> and Nataraja v The South Indian Bank.<sup>40</sup> The authorities do not, however, support the conclusion. In the first case, the note was endorsed merely for collection and in the second case, the mortgage debt was attached and sold in execution. Although a mortgage debt is immovable property under the TP Act, yet it is treated in some cases as movable property under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908--(o 21, rr 45 and 54) -- so that if a mortgage debt is attached and sold, the purchaser acquires not only the debt, but also the right to realise it by enforcement of the mortgage.<sup>41</sup> Nevertheless, in principle there is no reason to differentiate between a written mortgage and a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds and the dictum of CJ Wallis was dissented from in Elumalai v Balakrishna<sup>42</sup> where it was held that the assignment of a debt secured by a deposit of title-deeds does not pass the security in the absence of a registered assignment of the mortgage.

In the case last cited J Krishnan said:

In my view, it is only if a mortgage debt is transferred as a secured debt that it will carry the securities with it on the principle embodied in s 8, and not otherwise. Even in the case of a mortgage where there is no promissory note it cannot, I think, be said that the law does not allow the mortgagee to transfer the debt as an unsecured or simple debt without a registered instrument if he thinks fit to do so. The security is for his benefit and he can give it up if he likes; and the transferee will then get the right to the debt, but not to the security. Thus, as regards transferability in law as an unsecured debt, a mortgage for which a negotiable instrument has been taken does not seem to me to differ fundamentally from one where none such has been taken. In my view, in either case, if the debt is transferred by endorsement or otherwise, without the transferor taking care to transfer the mortgage right by registered instrument, the debt and the security will get dissociated and the security may possibly cease.<sup>43</sup>

In Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank,<sup>44</sup> the Privy Council went further. The Calcutta High Court had held that a transfer of a mortgage debt failed for want of a registered assignment, but the Privy Council held that the transfer might be treated as the transfer of a debt dissociated from the security, and that it was capable of being transferred under s 6 of the TP Act. Their Lordships considered that the debt divorced from the security was not an actionable claim, but a species of property for the transfer of which no specific mode was provided in the TP Act so that the transferee had to sue in the name of the transferor.

The question of the transfer of a mortgage debt was again considered in the case of Fanny Skinner v Bank of Upper India.<sup>45</sup> Fanny Skinner had borrowed money from the bank secured by a simple mortgage. The bank went into liquidation, and the liquidator as part of an arrangement of reconstruction executed an unregistered agreement transferring the mortgage debt to a trust. The liquidator then sued to enforce the mortgage. It was held that the agreement had not been completed and that as no transfer had been effected, the liquidator was entitled to sue. In the course of the case an interesting argument was raised and disposed of. It was contended that the agreement being unregistered, it operated as a transfer of the debt, but not of the security, so that the bank was left without the debt but with the security, and that the bank having lost the debt could not enforce the security. This was said to be the effect of the decision in Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank.<sup>46</sup> Their Lordships explained that that case did not lead to so extraordinary a result. In that case, the mortgage debt were due to the Bengal bank and had been mortgaged by that bank to debenture holders.

The debenture holders could recover from the Bengal bank the moneys they had lent to the bank, and for the security of which the Bengal bank had transferred the mortgage debts due to itself. However, it was only if the debenture holders proceeded to realize the mortgage debts due to the Bengal bank that it was necessary for them to sue in the name of that bank.

(16) Debt Secured by a Charge

A debt secured by a charge is not a mortgage debt, and may be transferred as an actionable claim by an unregistered instrument. A charge differs from a mortgage in that it does not transfer an interest in property, but creates a right to payment out of the property specified.<sup>47</sup> Nevertheless, it falls within s 17 of the Registration Act 1908 and the assignment of a charge must be by registered instrument.<sup>48</sup> An unregistered assignment of a debt to which a charge was annexed would pass the debt, but not the charge. This is the effect of the decision of the Madras High Court in Rajagopala v Ranganatha.<sup>49</sup> Although in that case the assignment had been construed as an express assignment of the charge as well as the debt, it is submitted that this makes no difference for even if the assignment is not an express assignment of the charge, but merely operates as such an assignment, it comes within s 17(1)(b) of the Registration Act 1908. In a judgment in an earlier stage of the case last cited, J Madhavan Nair said that s 8 of the TP Act cannot override the provisions of the Registration Act 1908.<sup>50</sup> Another Madras case must be distinguished, for it referred to a sale certificate which does not require registration.<sup>51</sup> The authority of that judgment is also impaired by an incorrect statement that an assignment of a charge need not be by registered instrument.<sup>52</sup> A case of Calcutta High Court also referred to the assignment of a charge with the debt, but the question of registration was not considered.<sup>53</sup>

(17) Decree

A decree is not an actionable claim, and a purchaser of a money decree for a secured debt cannot be behind the decree and enforce the security.<sup>54</sup>

(18) Interest on Debt

As to the sixth clause--the right of the transferee to the interest or income accrues from the date of the transfer in the same way as the right to rent and profits referred to in the second clause of the section. A transfer of shares, securities and promissory notes carries with it the right to future dividends and interest. If a debt is transferred, interest accruing after the date of the transfer passes as a legal incident of the property transferred, but not arrears of interest. If the debt is time-barred, the court cannot award interest, for interest is an accessory and when the principal is barred, the accessory falls along with it.<sup>55</sup>

Oral transfer

--A transfer of property may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by law.

(1) Oral transfer

Writing was not necessary under the Hindu law for the validity of any transfer whatsoever,<sup>56</sup> and in all ancient systems of law, transfer of possession was the only requisite to the transfer of title. The TP Act makes writing necessary in the case of a sale of tangible immovable property of the value of Rs 100 or upwards, or the sale of a reversion or other intangible thing<sup>57</sup> ; in the case of a simple mortgage, and in the case of all other mortgages (except a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds) when the principal sum secured is Rs 100 or upwards<sup>58</sup> ; in the case of a lease if it is from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent<sup>59</sup> ; and in the case of all gifts of immovable property<sup>60</sup> ; and of all transfers of actionable claims<sup>61</sup> . Exchanges are subject to the same rule as sales<sup>62</sup> ; and the law as to leases is subject to rules which the local government are empowered to make.<sup>63</sup>

Where the TP Act requires a registered instrument, the transfer cannot be effected in any other way. An unregistered deed of gift of immovable property does not effect a transfer.<sup>64</sup> A petition to the Collector admitting a transfer, or recitals in another deed or mutation of names or delivery of possession will not effect a transfer, if the TP Act requires a registered deed.<sup>65</sup> A transfer of title requires a conveyance, and this cannot be given effect by a mere agreement.<sup>66</sup> The Oudh Chief Court has held that a grant by way of guzara, being only a right to enjoy the usufruct, need not be made in writing,<sup>67</sup> but the correctness of this decision is doubtful.

Where no writing is required by the TP Act, the transfer may be made orally.<sup>68</sup> Thus, a partition of joint family property may be made orally,<sup>69</sup> and also a surrender of a lease,<sup>70</sup> and a release by a mother of her interest in joint family property.<sup>71</sup> A grant of land for life in discharge of a claim for maintenance is neither a gift, nor a sale and may be made orally.<sup>72</sup>

A contract to settle property in consideration of marriage need not be in writing.<sup>73</sup> In Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank,<sup>74</sup> CJ Rankin said that partition, release and surrender are all forms of transfer, but that so far as the TP Act is concerned, they come under no restriction. A right to recover a share of immovable property may be relinquished orally, and without an instrument in writing.<sup>75</sup> Oral transfers are valid in Punjab outside the cantonment and municipal limits.<sup>76</sup>

(2) Part Performance

The doctrine of part performance is an encroachment on the rule that when the Act prescribes the mode of transfer, the transfer may not be made in any other way. The doctrine is now enacted in s 53A and explained in the notes to that section.

Condition restraining alienation

--Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation absolutely restraining the transferee or any person claiming under him from parting with or disposing off his interest in the property, the condition or limitation is void, except in the case of a lease where the condition is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him: provided that property may be transferred to or for the benefit of a woman (not being a Hindu, Muhammadan or Buddhist), so that she shall not have power during her marriage to transfer or charge the same or her beneficial interest therein.

(1) Principle Underlying the Section

The principle underlying this section is that a right of transfer is incidental to, and inseparable from, the beneficial ownership of property. An absolute restraint on that power is repugnant to the nature of the estate, and an exception to the very essence of the grant.<sup>77</sup> In Coke upon Littleton, it is said--'Also, if a feoffment be made upon this condition, that the feoffee shall not alien the land to any, this condition is void, because when a man is infeoffed of lands or tenements, he hath power to alien them to any person by the law. For if such a condition should be good, then the condition should oust him of all the power which the law gives him, which should be against reason, and therefore such a condition is void'.<sup>78</sup> In Parry and Daggs IN RE.,<sup>79</sup> LJ Fry said:

From the earliest times the courts have always leant against any device to render an estate inalienable. It is the policy of the law always to make estates alienable, and it is immaterial by what device it is attempted to prevent an owner from exercising the power of ownership.

In Metcalfe v Metcalfe<sup>80</sup> J Kekewich said:

You cannot limit an estate to a man and his heirs until he shall convey the land to a stranger, because it is of the essence of an estate in fee that it confers free power of alienation, and it has long been settled that the same principle is applicable to gifts of personality.

The section incorporates a rule of justice, equity and goods conscience, and governs transfers to which the TP Act does not apply.<sup>81</sup> The High Court of Karnataka has held that a grant made by government (or by its authorised officer) in accordance with law, cannot be treated as a 'transfer' within the meaning of s 5. Hence, s 10 of the TP Act or the rule against perpetuities does not apply to government grants. Accordingly, a permanent restraint on the alienation of the grant, if authorised by the law applicable to such grant, is valid.<sup>82</sup>

- (1) A, B, C and D effected a partition of joint family property, and agreed that if any one of them should have no issue, he would have no power to sell his share but should leave it for the other sharers. A sold his share and died without issue, B, C and D sued to recover the share. The court held that the condition was void as repugnant to one of the legal incidents of property.<sup>83</sup>
- (2) The testator devised an absolute estate to his son provided always that if the son, his heirs or devisees, or any person claiming through or under him or them desired to sell the estate in the lifetime of the testator's wife, she should have the option to purchase the estate for £3000. The value of the estate was £15000. The court held that this was an absolute restraint on alienation in the widow's lifetime and void.<sup>84</sup>

(2) Transfer Subject to a Condition or Limitation

The condition referred to in this section must be a condition subsequent as defined in s 31 which divests an estate which has already vested. 'Condition' must be distinguished from 'limitation.' The word 'limitation' is a term of English law. It refers to words used in a conveyance to limit or define the nature of the estate created.

In Indian law, the question whether the words are words of limitation or words of purchase is a matter of construction. Thus, if the bequest is to 'A and his heirs' the words 'and his heirs' are words of limitation indicating that A has an absolute estate, but if the bequest is to 'A for life and after his death to his heirs' the heirs are direct objects of an independent and distinct gift.<sup>85</sup> In an Indian will, the words putra poutradi krama are words of limitation denoting an estate of inheritance.<sup>86</sup> In Madhavrao v Balahhai,<sup>87</sup> the property was settled in trust for 'my daughter K during her life ... and after her death in trust for the male heirs of the said K.' It was contended that this was an attempt to create an estate tail which was bad under the Hindu law, but the Privy Council held that it was an independent gift to the person, who answered the description of heirs at the death of K, ie, her sons living at her death. Words of limitation which denote an estate of inheritance do not of course imply a restriction on alienation.<sup>88</sup>

If there is a valid transfer, the condition in restraint of alienation is void, and the transfer stands. Thus, a bequest of an absolute estate subject to a condition that neither the devisee, nor his heirs should alienate the estate except for religious purposes is a valid bequest, but the condition is void for repugnancy.<sup>89</sup> However, limitations may be such as to create an estate not recognized by law, and if that is the case, the transfer fails. This distinction was made by the Privy Council in Tagore v Tagore,<sup>90</sup> where the testator attempted to create an estate in tail not recognized by Hindu law, with the result that the donee took an estate for life, and the heir at law succeeded to the estate at his death.

(3) Absolute Restraint on Transfer

A restraint on alienation may be absolute or partial. An absolute restraint is void, a partial restraint is not.<sup>91</sup>

The section says that a condition which absolutely restrains the power of alienation is void. In Macleay IN RE,<sup>92</sup> MR Jessel said that whether the condition took away the whole power of alienation substantially, was a question of substance, not of form thus, in Re Rosher, Rosher v Rosher,<sup>93</sup> the testator devised an absolute estate to his son with a proviso that if he sold during the lifetime of his wife, she should have an option of purchasing the estate at a price which was one-fifth of the market value. This was held to be in effect an absolute restraint, and void. A similar case was Elliot IN RE, Kelly v Elliot<sup>94</sup> where a tea plantation was devised absolutely, but a condition was annexed that if the devisee should sell the plantation 'I will direct her to pay to my brother the sum of £1,000 out of the proceeds of such sale, also the further sum of £500 out of the proceeds of such sale to (her sister)'-- the direction was held to be repugnant and void as a restraint on alienation. A provision in a partition deed prohibiting alienation of the property allotted absolutely to each coparcener without the consent of the other sharers is invalid as an absolute restraint.<sup>95</sup> Where a husband settled property on his wives, but subject to a condition that they could not alienate without his consent, the condition was held to be void under this section.<sup>96</sup> The same rule has been applied in Punjab where the TP Act is not in force.<sup>97</sup> After sale of land under a registered sale deed, there was an agreement immediately thereafter between the vendor and the vendee, to the effect that vendee or his heirs will not alienate or dissipate or fritter away the land. It was held that the agreement violated s 10 of TP Act and s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. As the agreement was unregistered, it did not revoke the sale (s 92, proviso, Indian Evidence Act 1872). Bar of estoppel or waiver would not operate against the vendee.<sup>98</sup>

(4) Restrictions for a Particular Time

As to restrictions for a particular time the case of Rosher v Rosher,<sup>99</sup> shows that a condition restraining alienation during a lifetime is invalid.

(5) Partial Restraint on Transfer

A condition only partially restraining alienation is valid.<sup>1</sup> In the case of a partial restraint, s 10 is not attracted.<sup>2</sup> Conditions restraining alienation for a particular time have already been considered in note (4) above. As to prohibition of alienation to a particular class, the English cases are not consistent. In Attwater v Attwater,<sup>3</sup> a condition not to alienate except to particular persons was held to be bad. On the other hand, a condition not to sell out of the family was held good by Lord Ellenborough in Deo d Gill v Pearson,<sup>4</sup> and by MR Jessel in Macleay IN RE.<sup>5</sup> Both these decisions were approved by the Privy Council in Muhammad Raza v Abbas Bandi Bibi,<sup>6</sup> where it was held that a condition restraining the transferee from transferring to a stranger, ie, outside the family, was not an absolute restriction, and was valid. Cases in which a condition against alienation to a stranger have been held to be an absolute restraint<sup>7</sup> can no longer be regarded as good law. In the Privy Council case above referred to, their Lordships said that after the passing of the TP Act, a partial restriction upon the power of disposition would not, in the case of a transfer inter vivos, be regarded as repugnant, and that there was no authority to suggest that a different principle was applied by the courts in India before that Act. A condition in a deed of partition that if any coparcener wished to sell his share in a residential house or if his share were sold in any other way, the other coparcener would be entitled to buy it was held to be valid. An agreement of this sort is proper and is enforceable against the promisor's representatives, and is not hit by s 14.<sup>8</sup> Similarly, a condition in a deed of partition by joint owners of land that the owner of a share could only sell it to the members of the community has been held valid.<sup>9</sup> Where the sale-deed permitted the transferee to part with or dispose off his interest in the land to any other person but not within the period of five years, it was held that the sale-deed was not hit by s 10 or 11 of TP Act.<sup>10</sup>

In a case decided by Bombay High Court, the sale deed of a property included a condition that it should not be sold to anybody outside the family of the vendor. The vendee sold the property to cousins of the vendor. It was held that the first cousins very much belonged to the vendor's stock (family). There was no breach of the covenant. Even assuming that there was a breach of the covenant, it was immaterial because the condition incorporated in the sale deed is void under s 10.<sup>11</sup> Section 10 of the TP Act provides that where property is transferred subject to a condition or a limitation absolutely restraining the transferee or any person claiming under it from parting with or disposing of his interest in the property, the condition is void. Therefore, such a condition imposed by a bye-law on its members that a member cannot alienate the property to a non-Parsi person would be prima facie illegal.<sup>12</sup>

A condition that if the vendee sells, he shall give the vendor the option of buying back is obviously not an absolute restraint. Cases relating to such a condition have arisen with reference to the rule against perpetuity, and are considered in s 14 below.

A condition in a kharposh grant made by a zamindar in favour of a junior member that the subject-matter of the grant was not liable to be attached, and sold in execution does not amount to an absolute restraint, and is not void.<sup>13</sup> It has been held that a clause in a lease deed, that the interest of the lease holder shall not be transferred without the written permission of the deputy commissioner did not impose a complete ban on transfer and was, therefore, not void under s 10.<sup>14</sup>

(6) Agreement in Restraint of Alienation

The section refers to a condition restricting the estate transferred, it has no application to an agreement affecting the transferee personally. In a case decided by Allahabad High Court,<sup>15</sup> the vendee executed a separate agreement that he would not transfer the property purchased to anyone except the vendor, and then at the same price. It was held that this agreement was void as it deprived the purchaser of the right of alienation. It is submitted that this is not correct unless, as in a Bombay case,<sup>16</sup> the agreement was by a registered instrument and part of the transaction of sale. The true rule was stated in the later Allahabad case of Devi Dayal v Ghasita.<sup>17</sup> In that case A sold a house to B and on the date of the sale, B executed a separate unregistered agreement that if he wished to sell the house, he would sell it back to A for the same price and would sell it to no one else, unless A declined to purchase. If this had been a condition of the sale it would have been invalid as a restraint on alienation,<sup>18</sup> but the court said that 'this was a special personal contract between the parties which was binding on them and could be enforced against a transferee with notice.' It is submitted that the effect of this decision is that an invalid condition in restraint of partition may yet operate as a personal covenant binding the covenantor personally, and creating an obligation enforceable against a transferee from him with notice under s 40. With reference to an award which contained an invalid condition against partition, the Privy Council said that it may have bound the parties who agreed amongst themselves to abide by it.<sup>19</sup>

(7) Restriction Against Alienation in Compromise

A compromise is not a transfer to which this section applies. A compromise operates, therefore, not as a transfer, but as an admission that the party has no right to alienate. The title so admitted may be a restricted interest which under s 6 is not transferable. This is explained in Basanowda v Irgodatti<sup>20</sup> where under a compromise between a widow and a reversioner, the widow was held to have a limited interest such as is referred to in s 6(d) -- now s 6(dd) -- which she could not alienate. Similarly, in Diwali v Apaji,<sup>21</sup> a case to which the TP Act did not apply, there was a compromise of a dispute between a widow and an adopted son under which an allotment of land was made for the maintenance of the widow with a provision in restraint of alienation. It was held that this land could not be attached for her debt as she had no disposing power over it. In Mata Prasad v Nageshar Sahai,<sup>22</sup> there was a dispute as to succession between a widow and a nephew. This was compromised on terms that the widow was to retain possession for life while the title of the nephew was admitted with a provision restraining him from alienating during the widow's lifetime. The Privy Council upheld this as a family settlement, prudent and reasonable in the circumstances of the case. Similarly, in a Calcutta case,<sup>23</sup> a document settling a dispute between a Hindu widow and two surviving members of the family provided that any lease given of the family property should be void, unless signed and consented to by both parties, and these provisions were held to be valid.

In Chamaru Sahu v Sona Koer,<sup>24</sup> J Mookerjee had to construe a deed of family settlement between reversionary heirs and two Hindu widows by which the reversioners were restrained from alienating during the lifetime of the widows. He considered that the restraint was void if not under s 10 then under s 11, but as the object of the restriction was to protect the rights of the widows to receive maintenance from what had been their husband's property, he held that the alienees of the reversioners who had accepted a mortgage contrary to the provisions of the deed of settlement held the property subject to the rights of maintenance possessed by the widows. It is submitted that the restrictions on the reversioners being the result of a family settlement, was valid, as in Mata Prasad's case. In Govind Waman v Murlidhar<sup>25</sup> the Bombay High Court held that a compromise decree which contained a term contrary to s 10 is not for that reason invalid. The decision was based on the ground that a consent decree is binding on the parties, until it is set aside.

It has been held by the Punjab High Court, however, that where the TP Act does not apply, that a condition against alienation in a compromise is void.<sup>26</sup>

(8) Restraint on Mode of Alienation

If, however, the restraint is on the mode of alienation, it is not restraint within the meaning of this section.<sup>27</sup>

(9) Restraint Against Alienation in Gift

Under s 126 of the TP Act, a gift may be made on an agreed condition that it may be revoked on the happening of an event which does not depend upon the will of the donor. However, the condition contemplated by s 126 which is in a chapter dealing with 'gifts' should not be repugnant to the provisions of ss 10 & 12 which deal with all 'transfers of property by act of parties.' Thus, where a deed of gift provided that the donee or his successor had no right to transfer the property and that if they did transfer, the same would be invalid and the donor or his successor would have a right to revoke the gift, the condition was held to be invalid.<sup>18</sup> The last paragraph of the section enacts that the condition of revocation does not affect the rights of transferees for consideration without notice. This makes it clear that the condition of revocation operates only as a personal covenant. It does not restrict the interest of the donee, and is not repugnant to the gift under s 10. It has, therefore, been held that if A makes a gift of his property to B, with a condition that A should be at liberty to revoke the gift if B transferred the property without A's consent, the condition does not contravene the provisions of s 10, and is valid.<sup>19</sup>

(10) Partition

Section 10 per se does not apply to family settlements and partitions.<sup>20</sup> Cases of restraint on partition are dealt with under s 11. The question whether partition is a transfer has been dealt with in some cases.<sup>21</sup>

(11) Restraint on Transferor

The section only refers to restraint on alienation by the transferee or those claiming under him. It has no bearing on cases where on a transfer a restraint is put on alienation by the transferor. This may occur where the transfer is of a partial interest as in a mortgage. In such cases, it may be a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>22</sup>

(12) Exception in the Case of Lease

A lease is an exception to the rule against an absolute restraint on alienation. This exception arises from the very nature of a lease which is a transfer of property for a time, or in perpetuity, but in which the lessor necessarily retains an interest. Thus, a condition in a lease that the lessee shall not sublet or assign is valid -- s 108(j) read with the words 'in the absence of a contract to the contrary.' It is also immaterial that the lease is a permanent lease.<sup>23</sup> A condition requiring the lessee to pay a fourth of the purchase money as nazar to the lessor in case he should assign the lease is valid.<sup>24</sup> A condition in a permanent lease, that should the necessity for alienation by the lessor arise the lessee will surrender the lease to the lessor, is valid.<sup>25</sup> So also a condition in a perpetual lease that the lessee's right shall be heritable, but not transferable is not void.<sup>26</sup>

The words in this section 'when the condition is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him' seem to be merely explanatory of the reason for the exception. They have been construed to mean that the restriction is invalid, unless accompanied with a right of re-entry.<sup>27</sup> This has been dissented from in a case decided by Madras High Court<sup>28</sup> on the ground that every such restriction is for the benefit of the lessor; but that case also held that a restriction without a right of re-entry gives the lessor a right to damages, but was invalid as a condition and does not have the effect of rendering the assignment invalid. The amendment made in s 111(g), by Act 20 of 1929, makes it clear that the breach of a condition against alienation will not work a forfeiture, unless the condition reserves a right of re-entry. A condition that in case of alienation by the lessee, the lease shall be void is not now sufficient to determine the lease, and the case of Vyankataraya v Shivrambhat<sup>29</sup> is now obsolete. Unless a right of re-entry is reserved, the breach of such a condition merely gives the lessor a right to an injunction and damages.<sup>30</sup>

The restriction on assignment prevents the lessee from assigning without the consent of the lessor. This is frequently expressed in the lease with the added clause that such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld. An express condition to the effect that the lessee if he assigned, would pay a fourth of the purchase money to the lessor has been held to be valid.<sup>31</sup>

A condition in a darpatti lease that if the darpatti is sold for arrears of rent, derivative tenures created by the darpattidar would be extinguished, is not a restraint on alienation.<sup>32</sup> According to the Allahabad High Court, right to transfer is not legal in case of perpetual lease.<sup>33</sup>

Rent-free grants under the Agra Tenancy Acts -- Uttar Pradesh Act 2 of 1901 and Act 3 of 1926--do not convey the proprietary title of the grantor landlord. Such grants are like leases exempt from the rule against absolute restraint of alienation embodied in this section. A condition in a rent-free grant restraining the grantees from alienating is, therefore, valid.<sup>34</sup>

(13) Effect of Involuntary Alienation on Conditions Against Alienation in Leases

An involuntary alienation does not constitute a breach of a condition against alienation in a lease. An assignment by the operation of law, such as a sale in execution, or a sale of the property of a company by an official liquidator,<sup>35</sup> or a sale by the official assignee,<sup>36</sup> is not a breach of the condition. In Golak Nath v Mathura Nath,<sup>37</sup> the Calcutta High Court said:

We take it to be clear law in India, as in England, that a general restriction on assignment does not apply to an assignment by operation of law taking effect in invitum as a sale under an execution.

But there may be an express prohibition of alienation in execution, and if so it will be enforced. In a Bombay case<sup>38</sup> where the condition was 'not to let the land be sold or attached in execution,' CJ Sargent said that if the lessee allowed the land to be attached and sold by not taking measures to satisfy his judgment creditor, there would be a breach both according to the letter and spirit of the provision in the lease. However, a condition in a decree on a compromise that a party shall have no power of alienation, is not broken if the property is sold in execution of a decree against the party.<sup>39</sup>

(14) Hindu and Mahomedan Law

The prohibition of a condition in absolute restraint on alienation enacted in this section conforms to Hindu and Mahomedan law. Under Hindu law, such a condition either in a gift inter vivos<sup>40</sup> or in a will,<sup>41</sup> is void. Even before the amending Act which makes the section directly applicable to Hindus, many cases affecting Hindus were decided with reference to this section.<sup>42</sup> In Mahomedan law also, a condition in restraint of alienation attached to a gift is void.<sup>43</sup> However, when a Mahomedan widow was restrained from alienating to a stranger as the result of a compromise, the Chief Court of Oudh applied the rule that a compromise is in no sense an alienation, and held that the restraint was valid.<sup>44</sup> This case was confirmed on appeal by the Privy Council,<sup>45</sup> and their Lordships observed that, apart from the favour with which courts regard family settlements, such a restraint was neither inconsistent with Mahomedan law, nor with s 10 of TP Act, and was permissible under English law which is applicable as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.

(15) Married Woman

The proviso recognizes as another exception the restraint on the power of anticipation in the case of a married woman who is not a Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist. This restraint was a clause introduced in marriage settlements whereby property was settled on married women for their separate use without power to sell or charge the corpus of the estate. The English Common law rule that a woman's property became her husband's on marriage was abrogated in respect of marriage after 1 January 1866, by s 4 of the Indian Succession Act 1865. However, in settlements designed to protect married women from themselves, this clause was retained and received statutory recognition in this section and in ss 56 and 58 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882. The Married Women's Property Act 1874, was passed to establish the separate property of married women who were married before 1 January 1866 with reference to their own wages and earnings. Section 7 of that Act says that a married woman may sue or be sued in her own name in respect of her separate property. Section 8 provides that a person entering into a contract with a married woman with reference to her separate property may sue and recover against her to the extent of that property. The High Court of Calcutta held that these provisions enabled a creditor to enforce his claim also against property which a married woman is restrained from alienating.<sup>46</sup>

This decision was followed by J Farran in a case of Bombay High Court<sup>47</sup> with great reluctance. The Madras High Court, however, held that full meaning can be given to s 8 of the Married Women's Property Act without imputing to the legislature an intention to ignore conditions in restraint of alienation distinctly recognized in a later Act.<sup>48</sup> Statutory effect has been given to the Madras view by the amended proviso to s 8 of the Married Women's Property Act, substituted by s 2 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplement Act 1929. This expressly provides that decrees passed against a married woman under s 8 cannot be executed by the attachment or sale of property she is restrained from alienating during marriage.

Restriction repugnant to interest created

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created absolutely in favour of any person, but the terms of the transfer direct that such interest shall be applied or enjoyed by him in a particular manner, he shall be entitled to receive and dispose off such interest as if there were no such direction.

Where any such direction has been made in respect of one piece of immovable property for the purpose of securing the beneficial enjoyment of another piece of such property, nothing in this section shall be deemed to affect any right which the transferor may have to enforce such direction or any remedy which he may have in respect of a breach thereof.

(1) Amendment

The only amendment made in this section by the amending Act 20 of 1929, is the substitution of the second paragraph for the old second paragraph.

(2) Principle

This section refers to a restriction on the enjoyment of property, while s 10 refers to a restriction on the transfer of property. Both sections rest on the same principle that a condition repugnant to the interest created is void. Where property is transferred absolutely, it must be transferred with all its legal incidents. The vendor is not competent to sever from the right of property, incidents which the law inseparably annexes to it, and to abrogate the law by a private arrangement. A 'habendum' (the part of the deed of conveyance which defines the nature of the estate granted, beginning with the words 'to hold') cannot override s 54 (which defines 'sale'). In a deed of sale, there cannot be created a life-interest in favour of the vendee. Such a limitation would be repugnant to s 11.<sup>49</sup>

(3) Sections 10 and 11 Compared

Section 11 refers to absolute interest only. A restraint on transfer is repugnant to any interest in property, whether absolute or limited, for the right of transfer is an incident of ownership. A restriction on enjoyment is repugnant to an absolute interest, but may not be repugnant to a limited interest such as a lease-hold or a life-estate.<sup>50</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A makes an absolute gift of a house to B with a direction that B shall reside in it. The gift is absolute and the direction is void. B may live in the house or not as he pleases.
- (2) A makes a gift of a house to B on condition that the gift will be forfeited if B does not reside in it. The condition is valid, for the gift is not an absolute gift but one subject to a condition of defeasance -- s 28 or 31.
- (3) A by sale conveys an absolute interest in a farm to B. The sale deed contains a direction that B shall not cut down the trees. The direction is invalid.
- (4) A assigns a life interest in a farm to B for her maintenance. The deed contains a direction that B shall not cut down the trees. The direction is valid.

It has been held that the provisions of this section override s 126, and that a gift restraining enjoyment is void.<sup>51</sup>

Absolute interest fall under both ss 10 and 11, and the words 'applied' (s 11) and 'disposed' (s 10) show that the sections do to a certain extent overlap. This is well illustrated by the case of Chamaru Sahu v Soma Koer.<sup>52</sup> In that case a Hindu widow transferred her husband's estate to the reversionary heirs with a condition that they should not alienate it in her lifetime. The case was one under s 10, but in view of some observations of MR Jessel in Macleay IN RE.,<sup>53</sup> J Mookerjee doubted if the restraint was absolute within the meaning of s 10, and, therefore, decided the case under this section.<sup>54</sup>

Cases restricting the right of partition fall as much under the section as the other.

(4) Distinction Between section 11 and section 31

The basic distinction between these two provisions relates to:

- (i) direction envisaged in s 11;
- (ii) a condition envisaged in s 31;
- (iii) an interest being created absolutely under s 11; and
- (iv) an interest being created not qualified by the word 'absolutely'; but with a condition superadded in s 31 of TP Act.<sup>55</sup>

(5) Indian Succession Act

The section corresponds with s 138 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The following illustration is annexed to the section in the Indian Succession Act 1925:

A sum of money is bequeathed towards purchasing a country residence for A, or to purchase an annuity for A, or to place A in any business. A chooses to receive the legacy in money. He is entitled to do so.

(6) Absolutely

The section does not apply, unless the transfer creates an absolute interest in the transferee. For a transferee to deal with interest in the property transferred 'as if there was no such direction' regarding the particular manner of enjoyment of the property, the instrument of transfer should evidence that an absolute interest in favour of the transferee has been created. The section rests on the principle that any condition which is repugnant to the interest created is void, and when property is transferred absolutely, it must be done with all its legal incidents.<sup>56</sup> It does not apply for instance, to a lease which is a transfer of a limited interest, and the lessee is bound by the conditions and covenants expressed or implied in the lease restricting his mode of enjoyment. When a deed of gift gave land to the donees as 'they are the descendants of the same stock as my family and there remains nothing now for their support, and the gift was expressed to be for their maintenance, a covenant restrictive of alienation was held not to be void for repugnancy, as the gift was not of an absolute interest, but of usufruct only.<sup>57</sup> So also, when land is granted only for use and cultivation;<sup>58</sup> or when a grant is made for life,<sup>59</sup> or a vendor reserves a subordinate interest for himself.<sup>60</sup> However, when an absolute estate is conveyed, any restriction on its enjoyment is invalid. Thus, when a co-sharer of a village sold his share to another sharer who executed at the same time an agreement not to collect rents, or demand partition, or alienate or encumber, or else the sale would be avoided, the court read the two documents together, and held the agreement to be repugnant to the proprietary interest conveyed by the sale deed.<sup>61</sup> A stipulation in a sale deed for the payment of a certain amount to the vendor out of the profits of the property by way of rent was held to be illegal.<sup>62</sup> In a deed of gift, properties were transferred to the son by his deceased father, on condition to provide maintenance to his dependents. Such a condition is not, in any way, repugnant to the interest created by the instrument. It is not hit by the provisions of s 11. The son was bound to maintain his stepmother, under the express terms of the deed of gift.<sup>63</sup>

(7) Partition

A right to partition is an incident of joint ownership of property. In Umrao Singh v Baldeo Singh,<sup>64</sup> a testator left his property to his sons jointly with a direction that the property should not be partitioned till all the sons attain majority. The Lahore High Court held that this was an invalid restriction on the right of enjoyment even though it was for a limited time. An agreement not to partition, though it may be binding on the immediate parties, will not bind their successors in interest.<sup>65</sup> The Bombay High Court has held that such an agreement is inconsistent with the Hindu law, and will not bind even the parties themselves;<sup>66</sup> and the Allahabad High Court has held that even an immediate party is not bound by an agreement not to partition for an indefinite time.<sup>67</sup>

Illustration

An arbitrator made an award between two sisters giving each a half share of an estate and appointing the husband of one sister manager, but directed that neither sister would have a right to claim partition. One sister died and her son sued for partition. The Privy Council held that the clause in restraint of partition afforded no defence to the son's suit for partition. Their Lordship said:

It may have bound the parties who agreed among themselves to abide by it; but as against the present plaintiff, the clause has no effect whatever ... (The arbitrator) had no power to make property which was divisible by law indivisible forever.<sup>68</sup>

On the other hand, an estate may be imitable by custom, or by the terms of the grant, for the Crown has power to grant or transfer land and by its grant or transfer, to limit in any way it pleases the descent of such lands.<sup>69</sup>

(8) Hindu and Mahomedan Law

The invalidity of conditions in restraint of enjoyment of property is recognized both in Hindu and Mahomedan Law. A direction in restraint of partition in a Hindu will;<sup>70</sup> or in a Hindu gift<sup>71</sup> is void. In Anantha v Nagamuthu<sup>72</sup> it was decided under Hindu law that a condition in a gift to Brahmins restrictive of alienation is invalid as being repugnant to the nature of grant; and the same decision was given in Rukminilal v Laxmibai<sup>73</sup> under this section. Under Mahomedan law when a gift is made subject to a condition which derogates from its completeness, the gift is valid, but the condition is void.<sup>74</sup>

(9) Restrictions for Beneficial Enjoyment of One's Own Land

This section relates to the enforcement of the restrictions against the transferee, while s 40 refers to the enforcements of the restriction against purchasers from the transferee.

The words 'compel the enjoyment,' which occurred in the old section, have been omitted in the section as amended. The omission of those words, however, does not effect any change in the law, for though words have been omitted, the substituted words 'to enforce such direction' have the same effect. In other words, the section as amended recognizes as much as did the old section that there may be a covenant which, though affirmative in character, may be enforceable as between the actual parties to the transfer, ie, the transferor and transferee. In Bhupati Bhushan v Birendra Mohan<sup>75</sup> it was held that a condition in a deed by which a vendee agrees to pay an annuity to B for life, and thereafter to the vendor, his heirs and successors forever out of a specific property, such a condition though not a covenant recurring with the land is a perpetual charge binding on the vendee and his heirs. Respondent-transferee is bound by the covenant in the sale deed mentioning the existence of a decree of permanent injunction against the vendors, in the enjoyment of the property purchased by him.<sup>76</sup>

(10) Position Under Section 40

Paragraph 1 of s 40 before its amendment, also contained the words 'compel its enjoyment,' which recognized that an affirmative covenant may be enforced even against a purchaser from a transferee. However, those words have now been omitted in that section, and the legislature has adopted the view that an affirmative covenant cannot now be enforced against a purchaser from a transferee. It is only a negative covenant that may be enforced against him, eg a covenant not to build. If there is such a covenant, and the purchaser buys with notice of the covenant, the court may restrain him by an injunction from building. There is no substitution in s 40 of the words 'enforce such direction' for the words 'compel the enjoyment' as in s 11. A restrictive covenant imposed for the better enjoyment of property cannot be enforced against the covenantor by a stranger, unless such a right can be specifically transferred to him.<sup>77</sup>

The result then is that there is no alteration in the law in s 11. The alteration is in s 40 to the extent mentioned above. In Nand Gopal v Batuck Prasad<sup>78</sup> a covenant to pull down, when required by the vendor, the rooms over a passage between the house of the vendor and the house sold, was held to fall under the second paragraph of s 11, and to be enforceable under s 40 against a transferee from the vendee. The case was decided under the law as it was before the amendment of the two sections. Under the amended sections, the covenant could have been enforced against the vendee under s 11, but being an affirmative covenant it could not have been enforced against a transferee from the vendee.

In determining whether a covenant is negative or positive, the court looks to the substance, and not to the form of expression.<sup>79</sup>

(11) Enforceable Against Whom

A single Judge of the Allahabad High Court has held that the second part of s 11 can be enforced only by the transferor, and not by a transferee of another portion of the property. This is so even though all the transfers have similar conditions imposed, and all were concluded on the same day and the conditions are imposed for the beneficial enjoyment of the portions transferred to such other transferees. A contract binds only the parties thereto. Section 40 also does not apply as it is confined to land burdened with restrictive covenants.<sup>80</sup>

Condition making interest determinable on insolvency or attempted alienation

--Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation making any interest therein, reserved or given to or for the benefit of any person, to cease on his becoming insolvent or endeavouring to transfer or dispose off the same, such condition or limitation is void.

Nothing in this section applies to a condition in a lease for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him.

(1) Forfeiture on Insolvency

The object of the section is to protect the creditors of the transferee who would otherwise be prevented from having recourse to the property transferred for the satisfaction of their debts. Despite a condition of defeasance on insolvency, the property would vest in the official receiver or the official assignee, as the case may be. The words 'dispose off' no doubt refer to settlements, for it would be a fraud on creditors if a man were permitted to settle his property in trust for himself until he should take advantage of the Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, and after that on a near relation.

Illustration

A settles property in trust for himself until his death or bankruptcy and then over, on either of these events, on his wife. A is adjudged insolvent. A's life interest vests in the Official Receiver or Official Assignee.

(2) Forfeiture on Attempted Alienation

In so far as the section invalidates a condition of defeasance on an attempted alienation, it rests on the same principles as ss 10 and 11 as to restrictions repugnant to the interest transferred.

Provident Fund

A rule of Provident Fund that a member purporting to transfer or assign his share or interest in the fund should forfeit such share or interest was held to be invalid under this section. The member applied to be declared insolvent. The Calcutta High Court held that though the vesting in the official assignee, which was the effect of the application, was a transfer by operation of law, yet the member's application to be declared insolvent was a voluntary transfer under the rule. However, as the rule was invalid there was no forfeiture to the fund, but the interest did not vest in the official assignee for the benefit of the creditors.<sup>81</sup>

Stock Broker's card --

The section has no application to a rule of Stock Brokers' Association forfeiting a defaulting member's card of membership.<sup>82</sup>

(3) Indian Succession Act 1925

In this matter, the provisions of the Indian Succession Act 1925 differ, for a bequest may be made subject to a condition of defeasance in the event of insolvency. Illustration (vii) to s 120 of that Act which is corresponding to illust (g) to s 107, Indian Succession Act 1865 are relevant in this respect.<sup>83</sup>

(4) Lease

Leases constitute an exception, for the lessor having the jus dis-ponendi may annex any conditions he pleases to his grant, provided they be not illegal or unreasonable.<sup>84</sup> A covenant determining a lease in the event of the insolvency of the lessee is valid.<sup>85</sup> The condition applies to the insolvency of the person who has the term created by the lease. If the lessee assigns the term and then becomes insolvent, the condition does not apply.<sup>86</sup> The insolvency of the lessee will not involve a forfeiture, unless there is a provision in the lease that the lessor may re-enter on the happening of such event. This is expressly enacted in the amendment made in s 111 (g) by the amending Act 20 of 1929. The new s 114A provides for relief of forfeiture in such cases.

A kharposh grant of certain property made by the holder of an imitable property in favour of junior for maintenance, is not a lease. A condition in such grant that if the said property is sold in auction for the grantee's debt the grant will come to an end, is not an absolute restraint on alienation and is not invalid under s 10, but is wholly void under s 12.<sup>87</sup>

(5) For the Benefit of the Lessor

The amendment of s 111(g) makes it clear that these words refer to a condition giving the lessor a right of re-entry.

Transfer for benefit of unborn person

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not in existence at the date of the transfer, subject to a prior interest created by the same transfer, the interest created for the benefit of such person shall not take effect, unless it extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property.

Illustration

A transfers property of which he is the owner to B in trust for A and his intended wife successively for their lives, and after the death of the survivor, for the eldest son of the intended marriage for life, and after his death for A's second son. The interest so created for the benefit of the eldest son does not take effect, because it does not extend to the whole of A's remaining interest in the property.

(1) Transfer for Benefit of Unborn Person

A transfer cannot be made directly to an unborn person, for the definition of transfer in s 5 is limited to living persons. Such a transfer can only be made by the machinery of trusts. Possibly it is intended to express this distinction by the words 'for the benefit of,' the trustees being the transferees who hold the property for the benefit of the unborn person.

Under Hindu<sup>88</sup> law, a child en ventre sa mere is in existence. In a case of Andhra Pradesh High Court, M executed a settlement deed in respect of the suit property, giving a life estate to his son G and, after G's death, to the sons of G, to be born, absolutely. G, in turn, executed a 'relinquishment' deed of his estate in favour of his father. It was held that merely because the relinquishment deed was executed before the birth of the sons of G, the gift in favour of the unborn sons would not fail. The invalidity of the transfer must be judged with reference to the original settlement deed, and not by the voluntary act of the donees under the deed itself. A person who obtains the benefit of a deed cannot, by his volition, defeat the terms of the deed under which he obtained the interest. The unborn acquired a vested interest on his birth under s 20. No one can defeat such interest. The life estate holder cannot defeat the interests of the unborn person by transferring the life estate to a third person. In this case, there was no possibility of defeating the interests of the unborn children as violative of the provisions of s 16.<sup>89</sup>

(2) Subject to a Prior Interest

The estate must vest in some person between the date of the transfer, and the coming into existence of the unborn person. The interest of the unborn person must, therefore, be in every case preceded by a prior interest; and the section in effect says that the interest of the unborn person must be the whole remainder, so that it is impossible to confer an estate for life on an unborn person. In the illustration to the section, the interest created for the benefit of the unborn eldest son is only a life interest and it, therefore, fails. In Girish Dutt v Data Din,<sup>90</sup> A made a gift of her property to B, her nephew's daughter, for life, and then to B's male descendants, if she should have any, absolutely; but if she should have no male descendants then to B's daughter without power of alienation; but if there were no descendants of B, male or female, then to her nephew. B died without issue. The gift to the unborn daughters, being of a limited interest and subject to the prior interest created in favour of B, was invalid under s 13 and the gift to the nephew, therefore, failed under s 16. The illust to s 113 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, may also be referred to in this connection.

(3) Indian Succession Act 1925

The section is almost identical with s 113, Indian Succession Act 1925. The difference between the two sections is that the former relates to transfer inter vivos, while the latter deals with bequest which take effect only on the death of the testator. The principle underlined in s 113 is that a person disposing of property to another shall not fetter the free disposition of that property in the hands of several generations. The rule is quite distance from rule against perpetuity, thought their effects sometimes overlap.

Section 13 controls s 113 and, therefore, both these sections should be read together.<sup>91</sup>

An instance of a bequest held invalid under this section is the case of Putlibai v Sorabji Naoroji.<sup>92</sup>

The Privy Council has considered the effect of s 113 of the Indian Succession Act in Sopher v Administrator-General of Bengal.<sup>93</sup> Their Lordships considered a will which provided for an ultimate bequest in favour of persons not born at the time of the testator's death, and the question that arose for decision was whether the bequest comprised the whole of the testator's remaining interest in the thing bequeathed. Two clauses in the will provided for the forfeiture of the interests of the unborn beneficiaries in certain contingencies. It was held that:

if under a bequest in the circumstances mentioned in s 113 there is a possibility of the interest given to a beneficiary being defeated either by a contingency or by a clause of defeasance, the beneficiary under the later bequest does not receive the interest bequeathed in the same unfettered form as that in which the testator held it and that the bequest to him does not therefore comprise the whole of the remaining interest of the testator in the thing bequeathed.

This decision was considered by Blagden J in Ardeshir v Dadabhoy,<sup>94</sup> a case where a settlement provided for a gift to the settlor's grandsons who were not yet born and which provided that if the settlor's sons pre-deceased the senior without male issue, the property was to revert to the settlor. The settlement also reserved a power of revocation in the settlor. The learned judge observed:

it does seem unfortunate that their Lordships' attention was apparently focussed entirely on s 113 and 120 of the Indian Succession Act and does not seem ever to have been called to illustration 3 to s 114...

In view of the decision in Sopher's case, questions would arise as to the validity of such settlements in which the settlor reserves a power of revocation or variation or in which the settlor provides for the management of the interests of the unborn persons after their birth and during their minority.

Both these decisions were considered by the Bombay High Court in Framroz Dadahhoy Madon v Tehmina.<sup>95</sup> The court held that the principle of Sopher's case was inapplicable to trusts of a settlement inter vivos.<sup>96</sup> The court construed the word 'extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property' as directed to the extent of the subject-matter and to the absolute nature of the estate conferred, and not to the certainty of its vesting.<sup>97</sup> This decision has been subsequently followed by the same high court.<sup>98</sup>

The Bombay legislature has, however, passed the Disposition of Property (Bombay Validating) Act 1947, by which it is provided that trusts or wills made prior to 1 January 1947, would not be deemed to be invalid by reason of s 13 of the TP Act or s 113 of the Indian Succession Act, ie, by the construction put on those provisions by the Privy Council in Sopher's case.

(4) Movables

As its position in the TP Act shows, the section applies to movable as well as immovable property.<sup>99</sup>

(5) Hindu Law

According to pure Hindu law, a gift or bequest in favour of an unborn person is void.<sup>1</sup> However, this rule has been modified by statute. The Madras Act 1 of 1914, Hindu Disposition of Property Act 15 of 1916, and Act 8 of 1921 validate gifts to unborn persons. These Acts have been amended by ss 11, 12 and 13 of Act 21 of 1929, and the amendments enact that subject to the limitations in chapter II of TP Act, and in ss 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, no transfer inter vivos or by will of property by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such dispositions. The omission of the word Hindu in s 2 makes this section directly applicable to Hindus.<sup>2</sup>

Rule against perpetuity

--No transfer of property can operate to create an interest which is to take effect after the lifetime of one or more persons living at the date of such transfer, and the minority of some person who shall be in existence at the expiration of that period, and to whom, if he attains full age, the interest created is to belong.

(1) Principle

The rule against perpetuity is founded on the general principle of policy guiding judges, that the liberty of alienation shall not be exercised to its own destruction, and that all contrivances shall be void which tend to create a perpetuity or place property forever beyond the reach of the exercise of power of alienation.<sup>4</sup>

(2) 'Perpetuity'

A perpetuity, in the primary sense of the word, is a disposition which makes property inalienable for an indefinite period.<sup>5</sup> In this sense it is concerned with certain interests created in proesenti, which are sought to be made inalienable for an indefinite period. In its modern sense, it is concerned with interest arising in futuro, and not with interest arising in proesenti. The present section, strictly speaking, deals only with the modern rule against perpetuities. In this sense TP Act appears to be incomplete.

(3) Rule as perpetuity in its primary sense

Examples of such interest in proesenti which have been held void under the name of perpetuity or as tending to a perpetuity are, as conveniently classified in Halsbury's Laws of England<sup>6</sup> as follows:

- (1) Estates and interests limited in proesenti with an unauthorised mode of devolution, for example an estate of inheritance not known to the common law; an unbarable entail; an estate in which successive heirs take life estates only; the attempted entail of a chattel made prior to 1926.
- (2) Interests held on perpetual non-charitable trust, where no person or persons can take any benefit, eg trusts to keep in repair a tomb not part of the fabric of a church.
- (3) Gifts to trustees for non-charitable indefinite objects or for non-charitable unincorporated institutions or societies which may last for an indefinite time.

As regards the first class, it will suffice to say that even under the Hindu law no estate can be created which is unknown to Hindu law. The principle on which the second class is put has been applied in India in Administrator General v Hushes.<sup>7</sup> The cases falling within the third class require consideration. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in an appeal from Australia<sup>8</sup> cited with approval the following passage from an unreported judgment of Lord Hanworth:

The problem may be stated in this way. If the gift is in truth to the present member of the society described by their society name so that they have the beneficial use of the property and can, if they please, alienate and put the proceeds in their own pocket, then there is a present gift to individuals which is good, but if the gift is intended for the goods not only of the present but of future members so that the present members are in the position of trustees and have no right to appropriate the property or its proceeds for their personal benefit, then the gift is invalid.<sup>9</sup> question of validity or otherwise of such a gift has to be approached by stages. The first question is: whether it is a gift to the individual members for the time being constituting the association, or is it a gift to the association. If the former, the gift is good. If it is a gift to the association as such, the next question is: whether it is a gift, free and unfettered, or is it a trust. If it is an unfettered gift, the gift is good. If it is a trust, the final question arises: whether it is an endowment so that the donee must hold the corpus for all times to come and cannot deal with the corpus as and when he pleases, or it is an immediate beneficial gift so that the donee can use the corpus and income as and when the donee pleases.<sup>11</sup> If it is an endowment, the gift fails as offending the rule against perpetuities in its primary sense and if not, it is good and valid.

Our section does not in terms deal with 'perpetuity' in its primary sense, and therefore, a perpetual gift in praesenti whether free or fettered, will not strictly be within the mischief of s 14. Where husband and wife intend to have a benefit of the property for their life and vested remainder to their unborn children, there is nothing illegal in giving the vested remainder to their unborn children, and creating life interest in themselves. This life interest created in favour of the wife can be enjoyed by her along with her husband, and on his demise for her residue period. This would be an interest created in them to appropriate in praesenti its uses for their own benefit. The life estate so created in favour of the wife does not offend the rule of perpetuity as incorporated in s 14.<sup>12</sup>

(4) Modern rule against perpetuities

The modern rule against perpetuities is thus enunciated by Jarman:<sup>13</sup>

Subject to the exceptions to be presently mentioned, no contingent or executory interest in property can be validly created, unless it must necessarily vest within the maximum period of one or more lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards.

The exceptions to the rule are conveniently set out in Halsbury's Laws of England.<sup>14</sup> It is this modern English rule which is with certain modifications, adopted by this section. The only exception to the rule expressly recognised by TP Act is that embodied in s 18. It will be presently seen that some of the exceptions recognized by the English law have also been recognized by courts in India.

So long as the transferees are living persons, any number of successive estates can be created. A transfer may be made to A for life, and then to B for life, and then to C for life, and so on, provided A, B and C are all living persons at the date of the transfer. However, if the ultimate beneficiary is some one not in existence at the date of the transfer, s 13 requires that the whole residue of the estate should be transferred to him. If he is not born before the termination of the last prior estate, the transfer to him fails under this section. If he is born before the termination of the last prior estate, he takes a vested interest at birth and possession immediately on the last prior estate.

The rule against perpetuities, however, does not require that the vesting shall take place at the birth of the ultimate beneficiary. What it does require is that the vesting cannot be delayed in any case beyond his minority. Thus, if after the life estates to A, B and C, the ultimate beneficiary is the eldest son of C, the limitation would be to C for life with remainder to C's eldest son, in which case the eldest son would take a vested interest at birth, although he may not have been born at the date of the transfer. However, if it is intended that the estate shall not vest in an infant, the limitation would be to C for life and then on trust for such son of C as shall first attain the age of 18; the son of C has then a contingent interest which becomes vested when he attains the age of 18. If the last limitation had been to C for life, and then on trust for such son of C as shall first attain the age of 19, the transfer after C's death would be void. The result of the rule against perpetuity is that the minority of the ultimate beneficiary is the latest period at which an estate can be made to vest.

(5) Regard Must be Had to Possible and not Actual Events

In deciding questions of remoteness, regard must be had to possible, and not to actual events.<sup>15</sup> This is made quite clear in the corresponding s 114 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, where the words are 'may be delayed'.

Illustration

R has a share in a village which he sold to the defendant reserving two bighas of land under the following condition: "Two bighas of land which I have excluded from the sale shall remain in my possession for life, and after my death in the possession of my lineal descendants... I and my lineal descendants have no right to transfer the land excluded ... If none of my lineal descendants be alive then the land shall be the own property of the vendee." This was a transfer to take effect on the death of the vendor's last lineal descendant. R had only one son who was alive at the date of the transfer, but who died childless. On actual facts, the transfer operated within the period allowed, but as it was possible that the transfer might have been postponed for 100 or 200 years until the vendor's lien was extinct, the transfer of the two bighas was void.<sup>16</sup>

In the case of special powers of appointment, regard should had to the facts which are ascertained when the power is exercised.<sup>17</sup>

Illustration

A testator died in 1872 leaving his property to his wife for life. He also gave his wife power to appoint on trust for their son and his issue in such manner, as she thought fit. The wife died in 1893 leaving a will whereby she appointed the property to her son for life with remainder to such of his children living at her death as shall attain the age of 25. All the son's children attained the age of 25 before the wife died, ie before 1893. The appointment was held to be valid.<sup>18</sup>

(6) Indian Succession Act

The rule against perpetuity is in s 114 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The following are the illustrations to that section:

- (i) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life and after his death to B for his life; and after B's death to such of the sons of B as shall first attain the age of 25. A and B survive the testator. Here the son of B who shall first attain the age of 25 may be a son born after the death of the testator; such son may not attain 25 until more than 18 years have elapsed from the death of the longer liver of A and B; and the vesting of the fund may thus be delayed beyond the lifetime of A and B and the minority of the sons of B. The bequest after B's death is void.
- (ii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B for his life, and after B's death to such of B's sons as shall first attain the age of 25. B dies in the lifetime of the testator, leaving one or more sons. In this case the sons of B are persons living at the time of the testator's decease, and the time when either of them will attain 25, necessarily falls within his own lifetime. The bequest is valid.
- (iii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B for his life, with a direction that after B's death it shall be divided among such of B's children as shall attain the age of 18, but that, if no child of B shall attain that age, the fund shall go to C. Here the time for the division of the fund must arrive at the latest at the expiration of 18 years from the death of B, a person living at the testator's decease. All the bequests are valid.
- (iv) A fund is bequeathed to trustees for the benefit of the testator's daughters, with a direction that, if any of them marry under age, her share of the fund shall be settled so as to devolve after her death upon such of her children as shall attain the age of 18. Any daughter of the testator to whom the direction applies must be in existence at his decease, and any portion of the fund which may eventually be settled as directed must vest not later than 18 years from the death of the daughters whose share it was. All these provisions are valid.

In Anandrao Vinayak v Administrator-General of Bombay<sup>19</sup> there was a gift of movable property to a son with a gift of shares in the property to the son's sons when they should attain the age of 21. The gift was held void as offending against perpetuity. Similarly in Kashinath v Chimmaji<sup>20</sup> a bequest to a son who might at any time be adopted by the life tenant was held to be invalid on the same ground. A disposition by the testatrix providing that the sons were to remain in possession of the properties and thereafter their sons without any power of alienation and further that the great grandsons will get the properties as absolute owners, was held to be not hit by the rule against perpetuity on the ground that the sons of the testatrix and their respective sons were alive.<sup>21</sup>

(7) Minority

Minority in India terminates at the end of 18 years. In a Privy Council case,<sup>22</sup> the bequest was to the testator's daughters for their lives with remainder to their children at the age of 21. The bequest to the children was held to be void under ss 114 and 115 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. An attempt, however, was made to support the bequest on the ground that if guardians of the children were appointed by the court under the Indian Majority Act 1875, they would not under that Act attain majority till the age of 21, but the contention failed because at the testator's death, it was not certain that any of the children would have guardians appointed.

(8) Hindu Law

Since the amendment of s 2 this section applied directly to Hindus. It was applied by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act 1916, and similar provisions were contained in the Madras Act I of 1914 and in Act 8 of 1921. The amendment made to those Acts by Act 21 of 1929 make transfers by Hindus to unborn persons subject to the limitations contained in chapter II of TP Act, and bequests by Hindus to unborn persons subject to the rules contained in ss 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. However, irrespective of the statute, a perpetuity is repugnant to Hindu law except in the case of religious and charitable endowments.<sup>23</sup> A disposition of shebaitsip by creating successive life interests is invalid.<sup>24</sup>

(9) Mahomedan Law

With reference to Mahomedan law, the Privy Council held in Abul Fata Mahomed v Rasamaya<sup>25</sup> that a gift to remote and unborn generations is forbidden by Mahomedan law except in the case of a wakf, and that a wakf is invalid if the gift is illusory. However, the law has since been altered by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act 1913, under which a wakf is valid even if the gift to charity is unsubstantial and illusory, provided there is an ultimate gift to charity. To this Act retrospective effect has been given by Act 32 of 1930.

In another case a Walf-Alal-aulad was created by a Muslim. The settlor executed a trust, setting properties for the benefit for the family, children or descendants from generation to generation, and thereafter for the maintenance of a holy shrine. It was held that the wakif-settlor made a dedication in perpetuity of the subject-matter of these trusts for purposes which are considered pious under Islamic law. The properties, therefore, ceased to be the properties for the settlor on the creation of the wakfs in 1953. It was further held that when the settlor died in 1967, the property could not form part of his estate as the settlor had divested himself of these properties 14 years prior to his death.<sup>26</sup>

(10) Movable and Immovable Property

The rule against perpetuity applies to movable as well as to immovable property.<sup>27</sup> This is indicated by the position of the section in this chapter.

(11) Charities

The rule against perpetuity does not apply to charities.<sup>28</sup>

(12) Power of Appointment

A general power of appointment does not tie up land, and, therefore, the period for the application of this section does not begin to run until the date of the exercise of the power.<sup>29</sup> Under special powers of appointment, the donee can transfer only to specified persons, and the effect, therefore, of such a power is to tie up land. In the case of a special power the period is to be reckoned from the date of creation of the power.<sup>30</sup> In ordinary cases, as already noted in note (5), in applying the section, regard should be had to possible and not actual events, but in the case of special powers, the facts to be regarded are ascertained when the power is exercised.<sup>31</sup>

In Re Legh's Settlement Trusts<sup>32</sup> by a deed of arrangement and re-settlement dated 2 October 1891, the trustees were amongst other things, directed to hold the residue of the trust funds and the income thereof upon trust to pay the income thereof to JRPL during his life and after his death to hold the capital and income in trust for all or any one or more of the issues of JRPL whether children or remote issue as JRPL should by deed or by will appoint. JRPL had five children including one Margaret Cowie who predeceased JRPL leaving two children DC and JJC who were born respectively on 13 March 1929 and 12 May 1931. JRPL, died on 5 March 1935, having made his will dated 3 March 1933. By that will JRPL amongst other things, made an appointment of a share to DC and JJC for their joint lives and after the death of either of them to the survivor for life. It will be noted that--

- (1) the power of appointment given to JRPL was a special power;
- (2) that the appointees were persons not in being at the date of the deed of arrangement;
- (3) at the date of the death of JRPL when his will took effect the appointees were in being.

In these circumstances, the appointment in so far as it was to DC and JJC, for their joint lives was quite good for the vesting of that interest must take place immediately upon the death of JRPL and, therefore, could not be delayed beyond a life in being at the date of the deed (ie the life of JRPL) and 21 years thereafter. The question was: whether the appointment in so far as it was to the survivor of them for life was hit by the rule against perpetuities. That depended on whether that appointment was a vested, or a contingent one. It was held that it was contingent, for there was no knowing as to who would be the survivor. It was quite possible that both of them might live for more than 21 years after the death of JRPL (the life in being at the date of the deed) and, therefore, the vesting of the life estate to the survivor might be delayed beyond the life in being at the date of the deed and 21 years. In the premises it was held that the reversionary life interest of the survivor being a contingent interest, offended against the rule.

(13) Provisions for Payment of Debts of Settlor

This is dealt with in s 17(2), and in the note 'Exception (i) --Payment of debts.'

(14) Agreement and Rule Against Perpetuities

The rule against perpetuity does not apply to personal agreements,<sup>33</sup> ie, agreements which do not create an interest in the property.

Illustration

The shebaits of a temple agree to appoint the family of C as pujaris from generation to generation to perform the services of the temple and make provision for the expenses and remuneration of the office. The agreement is valid and not affected by the rule against perpetuity.<sup>34</sup>

A condition in a mortgage that the mortgagor may redeem whenever he likes, refers only to the exercise of the equity of redemption which is a present interest. It is, therefore, outside the scope of the rule against perpetuity.<sup>35</sup>

Agreement to purchase land: Covenants for Pre-emption

Section 54 enacts that an agreement for the sale of land does not, of itself, create an interest in land. There was a considerable conflict of decisions as to the application of the rule against perpetuity to such agreements. This conflict has been resolved by the Supreme Court in Ramharan v Tarn Mohit<sup>36</sup> where it held that a mere contract for sale of immovable property does not create any interest in immovable property; it follows that the rule cannot apply to such contracts, eg a covenant of pre-emption.

Infact, s 14 begins with the words 'No transfer of a property can operate ....' and does not, therefore, apply where there is no 'transfer' of property, but only a contract which creates no interest in the land.<sup>37</sup>

In Maharaj Bahadur Singh v Balchand,<sup>38</sup> the Privy Council construing an agreement made before the TP Act, held that a covenant of pre-emption created an equitable interest in land, and is hit by the rule.

Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Ram Baran v Ram Mohit,<sup>39</sup> there had been a considerable conflict of decisions on this point which it is unnecessary to consider.<sup>40</sup>

Similarly, an agreement by a permanent lessee to surrender the lease whenever the land should be required by the landlord is a personal agreement not void for remoteness.<sup>41</sup> An agreement in a lease granting a perpetual option to renew from time to time is not hit by the rule as it does not create an interest in property.<sup>42</sup>

(15) Charge and rule against perpetuities

A charge does not amount to transfer of an interest in land and is, therefore, not affected by the rule against perpetuities.<sup>43</sup> However, if there is no charge on land, a trust for the payment of income to a payee and his descendants from generation to generation is void as offending against the rule of perpetuity.<sup>44</sup>

(16) Mortgage and rule against perpetuities

In Padmanahha v Sitarama<sup>45</sup> it was held that the rule against perpetuities applied only to cases where there was a new interest in immovable property contemplated to be created after the expiry of the time prescribed by the rule, namely the lifetime of a person living and the minority of one who might be in existence then and that in the case of a mortgage, there was no such future interest in property contemplated to be created because it was of the very essence of the mortgage that the equity of redemption was a present interest in the property in exercise of which alone the property was sought to be redeemed. In a case,<sup>46</sup> by a mortgage deed of 1931, the mortgagor covenanted to repay the mortgage money with interest by 80 half-yearly instalments and also demised the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee for 3000 years with the usual proviso for cesser on repayment of the mortgage money with costs and interests. The mortgagors being desirous of redeeming the mortgage brought an action for a declaration that the mortgagor was so entitled. It was contended on behalf of the mortgagor, amongst other things, that the mortgage which fixed the date of redemption so many years ahead offended the rule against perpetuities. The House of Lords in agreement with both the courts below on this point, held that the rule against perpetuities had no application to mortgages.

Transfer to class, some of whom come under sections 13 and 14

--If, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a class of persons with regard to some of whom such interest fails by reason of any of the rules contained in s 13 and 14, such interest fails in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class.

(1) Amendment

Before the amending Act 20 of 1929, the section was as follows:

If, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a class of persons with regard to some of whom such interest fails by reason of any of the rules contained in ss 13 and 14, such interest fails as regards the whole class.

Thus, in Raj Bajrang Bahadur Singh v Thakurain Bakhtaraj Kuer,<sup>47</sup> the Supreme Court held that it was true that no interest could be created in favour of an unborn person, but when the gift was made to a class or a series of persons, some of whom were in existence and some were not, it did not fail in its entirety; it was valid with regard to those persons who were in existence at the time of the testator's death, and was invalid as to the rest.

(2) Indian Succession Act

The present section of the Act corresponds to s 115 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The first two illustrations to that section are as follows:

Illustrations

- (i) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to all his children who shall attain the age of 25. The gift to A's children is a gift to a class. A survives the testator, and has some children living at the testator's death. Each child of A's living at the testator's death must attain the age of 25 (if at all) within the limits allowed for a bequest. But A may have children after the testator's decease, some of whom may not attain the age of 25 until more than 18 years have elapsed after the decease of A. The bequest to A's children, therefore, is inoperative as to any child born after the testator's death and in regard to those who do not attain the age of 25 within 18 years after A's death, but is operative in regard to the other children of A.
- (ii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B, C, D, and all other children of A who shall attain the age of 25. B, C, and D are children of A living at the testator's decease. In all other respects the case is the same as that supposed in illust (i). Although the mention of B, C and D does not prevent the bequest from being regarded as a bequest to a class, it is not wholly void. It is operative as regards any of the children B, C, or D, who attains the age of 25 within 18 years after A's death.

This section applies only in a case in which the whole class is intended to be benefited. It does not apply where there is no benefit to a class.<sup>48</sup>

(3) Hindu Law as to Gift to a Class

Prior to the Acts of 1914, 1916 and 1921, relating to gifts and bequests to unborn persons (s 13), a gift to a person who was not in existence at the date of the gift was void; and so was a bequest to a person who was not in existence at the date of the testator's death. This proceeded on the principle that a person who was not in existence at the material date was incapacitated from taking the bequest. Thus, if a gift was made by a Hindu to his grandsons and none of them was in existence at the date of the gift, none of them had the capacity to take, and the gift was, therefore, void. However, what if a gift was made by a Hindu to his grandson S who was in existence at the date of the gift, and to other grandsons (brothers of S) who might be born after the date of the gift, and some grandsons are born in fact after the date of the gift? It is obvious that the grandsons who were born after the date of the gift could not take; but could S take? In some of the earlier cases it was held on the analogy of the rule in Leake v Robinson,<sup>49</sup> that the gift having failed as to the other grandsons, it was wholly void, and that S too could not take. However, it was held in later cases and also by the Judicial Committee that the rule in Leake v Robinson was a rule of construction of the English law, and that it did not apply to Hindus, and that the incapacity of the other grandsons to take did not incapacitate S from taking, with the result that S took the whole of the property which was the subject-matter of the gift.<sup>50</sup> The sections of the TP Act and the Indian Succession Act which contain the rule against perpetuity did not then apply to Hindus, and Leake v Robinson, therefore, could not possibly apply to Hindu gifts and bequests and ought not to have been applied to them.

The course of legislation is worth observing. First came the Madras Act of 1914. It validated gifts and bequests in favour of unborn persons, and thus removed the bar of incapacity. It also applied for the first time the rule against perpetuity to cases governed by the Act. Similar provisions were introduced by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act 1916, and the Hindu Transfers and Bequests (City of Madras) Act 1921. The result of this legislation was that in the case put above, grandsons other than S, though not in existence at the date of the gift, could also take under the deed.

The Indian Succession Act in force when the three Acts were passed was that of 1865. Section 100 related to bequests for the benefit of unborn persons; it is now s 113 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. Section 101 related to the rule against perpetuity; it is now s 114 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. Section 102 related to bequests to a class; this corresponds to s 115 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, before it was amended in 1929. Another Act in force when the three Acts were passed was the Hindu Wills Act 1870. Certain sections of the Indian Succession Act 1865, were made applicable to cases governed by the Hindu Wills Act, one of them being s 102. Section 102 was in the following terms:

If a bequest is made to a class of persons, with regard to some of whom it is inoperative by reason of the rules contained in the two last preceding sections, or, either of them, such bequest shall be wholly void.

Though s 101 was incorporated in all the three Acts, s 102 was not, the intention being to keep alive the rule of Hindu law that if a gift or bequest was made to a class of persons with regard to some of whom it was inoperative by reason of the fact that 'they were not in existence at the material date', the gift or bequest failed in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class. However, the legislature, it would appear, overlooked the Hindu Wills Act, and particularly the inclusion in that Act of s 102. This was not noticed until the decision of the Judicial Committee in Soundara Rajan v Natarajan.<sup>51</sup> The will in that case was governed by the Madras Act of 1914. Amongst the properties disposed off by the will, were some immovable properties situated in the city of Madras. This attracted the applicability of the Hindu Wills Act. The testator died in 1904, leaving three daughters, A, B and C. A had four children, three born before, and one after 1904. B has one child born before 1904. C had six children all born after 1904. By his will the deceased directed his trustees to apportion his residuary trust fund into as many equal shares as there were daughters, to pay the income from each of such shares of the daughters for life respectively, and after the death of each daughter to hold the share appropriated to her 'upon trust for the children of such daughter who shall attain the age of 21 years.' The testator was survived by the three daughters. After their death, a suit was brought by the children of the third daughter C, against the children of A and B for construction of the will and for administration of the estate of the testator. The Judicial Committee held that the bequest to the unborn children was invalid under s 101 of the Indian Succession Act 1865, now the Indian Succession Act 1925, s 114, as it offended the rule against perpetuity, and that the bequest being to a class and being invalid as to some members, it failed also in regard to the children born before the death of the testator under s 102 of that Act (corresponding to the Indian Succession Act 1925, s 115, before it was amended in 1929). In the case under consideration, the bequest to the children to an unborn person is void, for the Madras Act validated such bequest, but because of the rule against perpetuity contained in s 101. The bequest being void as to some members of the class under s 101, it was wholly void under s 102. This led to the amendment of s 15 of the TP Act, and s 115 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, in the manner stated above. When a gift to a class was bad in accordance with the ordinary rule of English Law, the members of the class take per capita. In the case of a gift made by a Hindu testator, the will must be construed according to the notions of a Hindu and the Hindu Law of succession, and it can be held that the members of the class take per stirpes.<sup>52</sup>

(4) Mahomedan Law as to Gift to a Class

The rule in Leake v Robinson mentioned above has been held not to apply to khojas in Bombay.<sup>53</sup> It has, accordingly, been held that where there is a bequest to a class of persons some of whom are in existence at the testator's death and some are born after his death, the gift fails in regard only to those who were born after the testator's death, and not in regard to the whole class. This decision coincides with the amended s 15. There is no reason why other sects of Mahomedans should be governed by a different rule.

Transfer to Take Effect on Failure of Prior Interest

--Where, by reason of any of the rules contained in sections 13 and 14, an interest created for the benefit of a person or of a class of persons fails in regard to such person or the whole of such class, any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect after or upon failure of such prior interest also fails.

(1) Amendment

This section was amended by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) Principle

The section follows the English law that a limitation following upon a limitation void for remoteness is itself void even though it may not of itself transgress the rule against perpetuity.

The case of Girjesh Dutt v Data Din<sup>54</sup> cited in the note on s 13 is an illustration of the rule under this section. A made a gift of her property to B her nephew's daughter, for life, and then to B's male descendants, if she should have any, absolutely; but if she should have no male descendants, then to B's daughters without power of alienation; but if there were no descendants of B, male or female, then to her nephew. B died without issue. The gift to the unborn daughters, being of a limited interest and subject to the prior interest of B, was invalid under s 13, and the gift to the nephew, therefore, failed under s 16.

(3) Prior Interest Otherwise Invalid

The prior interest may be invalid otherwise than under the rules contained in ss 13 and 14. It may depend upon a condition precedent which is invalid under s 25. If so the subsequent interest, if it is to take effect after the prior interest, would fail under s 25, for it would also be dependent on the invalid condition. If the subsequent interest is to take effect upon failure of the prior interest and the prior interest is invalid under s 25, the subsequent interest would fail under the combined effect of ss 25 and 28.

(4) Prior Interest not Invalid but Subsequently Fails

If the prior interest is not invalid, but subsequently fails because the condition upon which it depends is not fulfilled, s 27 applies, and the subsequent interest is, as a rule, accelerated.

(5) Indian Succession Act

This section corresponds to s 116 of the Indian Succession Act 1925.

(6) Alternative limitations

The rule does not apply if the subsequent interest is not dependent on the prior interest, but is alternative to it. If there are two alternative limitations, one branch of which is remote and the other capable of taking effect, the court will disregard the void limitation and give effect to that which is legal.<sup>55</sup> An alternative or independent gift or a gift which can take effect independently of a void limitation is valid.<sup>56</sup> Thus, in Monypenny v Derring,<sup>57</sup> the gift was to PM for life, then to his first son for life, then to the first son of that first son and his heirs male and in default of such heirs male to other sons of PM 'and in default of issue of the body of PM, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, for TM for life.' Lord St Leonards held that the limitation to the unborn grandson of the unborn son was void, but in the event that actual happened, ie, PM not leaving any issue at his decease, the alternative gift to TM was valid. There have been other instances of an alternative gift.<sup>58</sup>

(7) Vested Gift

The section in terms 'any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect or upon the failure of such prior interest.' Any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect immediately and independently of the prior gift, and which does so take effect is clearly not within the mischief of the section. A gift may be vested in interest although it is not vested in possession. An ulterior gift which is vested in interest in praesenti does not fail if the prior gift is bad by reason of ss 13 and 14.

(8) Hindu Law

Some cases decided under the Hindu law are illustrations of the section. In the Tagore case<sup>59</sup> property was bequeathed to A and his male heirs in tail and after the failure or determination of that estate, to B and his male heirs in tail, and then to C and his male heirs in tail. The limitations in tail male were void both under Hindu law, and the rule against perpetuities. A took an estate for life and though B's son and C's grandson were alive at the death of the testator, the estate passed at A's death to the heir at law. Again, in Brajanath v Anandamayi,<sup>60</sup> the testator, not having any great-grandsons living at his death, bequeathed his property to great-grandsons on their attaining majority, and in case there were no great-grandsons, to the daughter's sons. The gift to the great-grandsons was void for remoteness, and the court held that the gift to the daughter's sons was dependent on and not alternative to it, and, therefore, also failed.

Alternative limitations are also illustrated by Hindu law cases. In Javerbai v Kablibai,<sup>61</sup> M by will bequeathed his property to his wife and his brother J for their lives, and after the death of the survivor of them to the male issue of J, and in default of such male issue, to such persons as J may appoint. J had no male issue and exercised the power of appointment in favour of his daughter. The gift to the male issue of J was void, but the gift over under the power of appointment was an independent and alternative gift and, therefore, valid. It should be observed that the daughter took from the testator M and not from J, for under a power of appointment, the property is taken not from the donee of the power, but from the grantor of the power.<sup>62</sup> Another instance is Kumar Tarakeswar Roy v Kumar Shoshi Shikhareswar.<sup>63</sup> A bequeathed his property to three nephews B, C, and D and their descendants in the male line without power of alienation, with a gift over in the following terms: 'If any of the nephews should die without leaving a male child, then his share devolves on the surviving nephews and their male descendants.' Here the attempt to create an estate in tail male failed and such nephew took an estate for life. However, though the estate in tail male which was dependent on each life-estate failed, the independent gift over from one nephew to another was not affected. On the death of B and C without issue their shares passed to D, but only for a life-estate, for the estate in tail male of the surviving nephew was also void. When the donor made gifts to relations and for charitable purposes, the Privy Council have held that the provisions for his relations would fail in so far as they were contrary to law, and the other dispositions would also fail if they were dependent thereupon and inseparable therefrom, but the invalidity of certain of the gifts to relatives would not be fatal to other dispositions apparently separable, and charitable gifts would not be bad because, though substantial, they did not involve a sufficiently large part of the settled property or because the beneficial interest was not given to a specified individual or individuals. The Privy Council further held that though the settlor had certain religious objects, the case was in its general character one of private bounty and educational trusts and under ss 14, 16, 17 and 18 of the TP Act, non-charitable dispositions bad for perpetuity would not be validated by the presence of a charitable trust.<sup>64</sup> Here the gift to charity was not dependent on the gift to the relatives.

Direction for Accumulation

- (1) Where the terms of a transfer of property direct that the income arising from the property shall be accumulated either wholly or in part during a period longer than--
  - (a) the life of the transferor, or
  - (b) a period of eighteen years from the date of transfer, such direction shall, save as hereinafter provided, be void to the extent to which the period during which the accumulation is directed exceeds the longer of the aforesaid periods, and at the end of such last-mentioned period the property and the income thereof shall be disposed off as if the period during which the accumulation has been directed to be made had elapsed.
- (2) This section shall not affect any direction for accumulation for the purpose of--
  - (i) the payment of the debts of the transferor or any other person taking any interest under the transferor, or
  - (ii) the provision of portions for children or remoter issue of the transferor or of any other person taking any interest under the transfer; or
  - (iii) the preservation or maintenance of the property transferred, and such direction may be made accordingly.

(1) Amendment

This section was inserted by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) Accumulation of Income

A direction which separates the income from the ownership of property so as to form a separate fund, or so as to postpone the beneficial enjoyment of property, is a direction for accumulation. The rule against perpetuities has for its object, the circumscription of the period during which the property might be tied up in such a way as to prevent its being transferred absolutely. Earlier, an accumulation of income could be directed for so long as the property could be tied up without infringing the rule against perpetuities. The object of this section is to make a separate rule further restricting the period for the accumulation of income.

A direction for accumulation may be express as well as implied. The question is one of construction, and if the disposition cannot be carried out without an accumulation, the section applies.<sup>65</sup>

(3) Void Under the Rule Against Perpetuities

Independently of this section, a direction for accumulation may be void under the perpetuity rule if the accumulation is directed for a period in excess of that allowed by the perpetuity rule. Thus, if A transfers property to B for life and then to the son of B who shall first attain the age of 25, with a direction to accumulate the income till the son attains that age the direction would be void under the perpetuity rule. However, if A transfers property to B for life, and then to the first son of B who shall attain the age of 18 with a direction to accumulate the income during the lifetime of B and until the son attains that age, there is no infringement of the perpetuity rule, and the direction would be valid for one of the statutory periods allowed by this section.

(4) Void for Repugnancy

Independently of this section, a direction for accumulation may be void for repugnancy. A direction for accumulation is a restriction on enjoyment such as is referred to in s 11. However, while s 11 is limited to transfers which create an absolute interest in the transferee, s 17 refers indifferently to any transfer. Where a transfer is of an absolute interest, the exceptions to this section are also exceptions to s 11. However, if there is an absolute gift, a direction for accumulation for the benefit of the donee, merely postpones enjoyment, and is void for repugnancy. This is illustrated by Indian<sup>66</sup> cases. The first illustration to s 56 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882, shows that a direction for the accumulation of the income of a minor is determinable when he attains majority.<sup>67</sup>

(5) Savings Out of Income

The section does not apply to savings out of income made voluntarily by the person entitled to the income, or by the court on behalf of an infant.<sup>68</sup> Nor does it affect the discretionary power of trustees to make accumulations out of a minor's income under s 41 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882.

(6) Powers to Accumulate

In England, the law prohibits any person from settling or disposing of property in such a manner that the income thereof, would be accumulated beyond the periods there indicated.<sup>69</sup> It followed that it hit cases where, though there was no direction to accumulate beyond the permitted periods, there was power to trustees to do so, and where the trustees were in fact accumulating the income beyond the permitted periods or were contemplating doing so. It is submitted that this would not be the case in India where s 17 only prohibits directions providing for an accumulation of income beyond the permitted periods.

(7) Period

The period are expressed to be in the alternative so that an accumulation cannot be directed during a combination of two periods. The appropriate period is a question of construction, and is the one that best accords with the intention expressed in the instruments.<sup>70</sup>

(8) Excessive Accumulation

If accumulation is directed to be for a longer time than that allowed by the section, it is invalid for the excess over the appropriate period, and that income for the excess period as well as the interest on the accumulated fund, belongs to persons, who would have been entitled, if there had been no direction to accumulate.<sup>71</sup>

(9) Failure of Purpose

Where on a true construction of the instrument directing accumulation and investment, the purpose or object to which that accumulation and investment is directed entirely fails, the provision cannot be enforced and the direction for accumulation cannot be read as an independent provision. Thus, where a testator after bequeathing an annuity to his mother directed his trustees out of the income of his residuary estate to pay an annuity to his wife and to accumulate the surplus income during the life of his wife or for 21 years from his death (whichever was the shorter) and directed that at the end for the period of accumulation, the residuary estate including the accumulation for his children should be held on trust for his children, but died without issue, it was held that the testator having died without issue, there was no effective disposal by his will within the meaning of s 49 of the Administration of Estate Act 1925, of the residuary estate, and that the direction for accumulation was not a direction to which the property not effectively disposed off by the will was subject. The direction for accumulation here came to an end by reason of the failure of its object and purpose, and the widow became entitled to the surplus income as on an intestacy.<sup>72</sup>

(10) Exceptions

The first two exceptions closely follow those in s 164 of the Law of Property Act 1925. The third exception is not in the English Act, but follows the case of Vine v Raleigh.<sup>73</sup>

Exception (i) Payment of debts--

A provision for the payment of debts, not being the debts of the transferor, but payable on a contingency which might happen outside the perpetuity period would be void as infringing the rule against perpetuities. So also, a transfer contingent on the payment of specified debts, for the debts might not be paid within the perpetuity period.<sup>74</sup> However, directions for the payment of debts or provisions for accumulation of income for that purpose, for however long a period, are not only exempt from the statutory restriction on accumulation, but do not infringe the rule against perpetuities. Such a provision does not tie up property absolutely so as to prevent its being transferred absolutely, because the creditor may at any time insist on payment, or the person indebted can at any time discharge the debt.<sup>75</sup> A trust or direction to pay a debt is, therefore, if possible, construed as a charge for the payment of debts, and the transferee is considered as taking a vested interest subject to the charge.<sup>76</sup> Thus, on an assignment of a lease for 99 years, a trust to accumulate half the rent for the whole term, for the payment of the debts of the transferor, would be valid as creating a charge on the lessee's interest. A direction for the payment of debts has been held to be valid even when it is annexed to and forms part of a series of limitations, all or some of which infringe the rule against perpetuities.

The debts may be existing debts, or contingent liabilities to arise in future.<sup>77</sup> If the debts are paid not out of income, but out of capital, the exception ceases to apply and the trust for accumulation of income to recoup capital is valid for one of the statutory periods.<sup>78</sup> If the provision is not made in good faith the exception will not apply.<sup>79</sup> So a provision to accumulate income against a liability that is not likely to become a debt,<sup>80</sup> or to retain and set apart income to create a reserve fund against future liabilities in business<sup>81</sup> is subject to the statutory periods.

In order, however, that such a provision falls within the exception, the provision must not be a provision which might or might not be used for the payment of such debts at the discretion of some third person; it ought to be a provision which must be applied for that purpose.<sup>82</sup>

The English exception is wider for it includes the debts of the grantor, settlor, testator or any person and it has been held that the other person may be a stranger.<sup>83</sup>

Exception (ii) Provision of portions--

The word portion ordinarily means a share and points to the raising of something out of something else for the benefit of some children or class of children.<sup>84</sup> It does not apply to the making of additions of income to capital in order to increase the capital for the person to whom it is given.<sup>85</sup> The exception only applies to provisions which must be applied for the provision of portions; and cannot save provisions which may or may not be so applied at the discretion of some third person.<sup>86</sup>

Exception (iii) Preservation and maintenance--

The third exception is not in the English Act, but it has, no doubt, been suggested by the case of Vine v Raleigh,<sup>87</sup> where a trust out of income to maintain houses in good repair was held to be outside the Thellusson Act. A fund provided to meet dilapidations at the end of a lease is within the exception.<sup>88</sup> A direction which simply keeps the property at its present value is not affected by the rule restricting accumulation of income.<sup>89</sup>

(11) Indian Succession Act

A similar amendment has been made in the corresponding s 117 of Indian Succession Act 1925.

(12) Hindu law

As stated above, a direction for accumulation for the benefit of the donee was under Hindu law repugnant to an absolute gift.<sup>90</sup> The section is not inconsistent with any rule of Hindu law, and is made applicable to Hindus by the amendment of s 2.

The direction is valid, unless the conditions are so unreasonable as to be against public policy, or unless it is given for an illegal object or its effect is inconsistent with Hindu law.<sup>91</sup> Thus, in Krishnaramani v Ananda Krishna<sup>92</sup> there was a trust of surplus income to be accumulated, and every time the accumulations amounted to three lakhs, they were to be divided among the sons and descendants per stripes. Justice Macpherson said that the direction was part and parcel of a perpetuity and was wholly bad. This is always the case when the trust for accumulation is not accompanied with any disposition of the corpus of the property.<sup>93</sup> A direction to accumulate surplus income for the benefit of a son to be adopted,<sup>94</sup> or for the payment of debts or the benefit of the minor donee,<sup>95</sup> or for the marriage expenses of the testator's son,<sup>96</sup> has been held to be valid.

In Amrito Lall v Surnomoye,<sup>97</sup> J Jenkins said that for the period of accumulation under Hindu law 'The limit must be that which determines the period during which the course or devolution of property can be directed and controlled by the testator.' In Gosavi Shivgar v Rivett-Carnac,<sup>98</sup> where the devise was to a minor disciple for whom a portion of the income was to be accumulated until he was of the age of 30, it was held that he was entitled to all the income after he attained majority.

In the absence of any direction to the contrary, the rule of Hindu Law is that accumulations of income go with the capital.<sup>99</sup>

Transfer in Perpetuity for Benefit of Public

--The restrictions in sections 14, 16 and 17 shall not apply in the case of a transfer of property for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, health, safety or any other object beneficial to mankind.

(1) Amendment

This section was amended by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) Principle

The rules restricting remoteness and perpetuity and against accumulations of income prevent fetters being put upon the free circulation and enjoyment of property. However, when property is given for an object beneficial to the public, it is withdrawn from commerce, and it is generally necessary that it should be kept intact, and its use restricted to the object for an indefinite period.

(3) Some Points of Difference Between English and Indian Law Relating to Perpetuities

- (i) The English rule against perpetuities deals with both interests created in praesenti and interests to arise in future; but the rule incorporated in the TP Act (s 14) and the Indian Succession Act 1925 (s 114) deals with interests to arise in futuro only, and there is no express provision prohibiting or dealing with interests in praesenti which are sought to be made of indefinite duration.
- (ii) There is a difference in the period during which vesting may be delayed, the English law allowing 21 years in gross after life or lives in being, the Indian law allowing only the period of majority after a life or lives in being.<sup>1</sup>
- (iii) Some interests created in praesenti, eg charitable trusts and unfettered present gifts to perpetual institutions are permissible and valid in England, and they are regarded as exceptions to the rule against perpetuities in so far as that rule applies to interests in praesenti. There is no provision in the TP Act or the Indian Succession Act expressly prohibiting the creation of perpetual estates or interests in praesenti or providing for any permissible exception thereto.
- (iv) Charitable trusts in futuro are no exceptions to the modern English rule against perpetuities which deals with estates in future. Therefore, charitable trusts, to be valid in England must vest within the period allowed by the English law, and if the vesting may be delayed beyond that period even the charitable trust will fail.<sup>2</sup> However, the position in India is different. Thus the TP Act, s 18, relaxes the rule against perpetuities embodied in s 14 in the respect of transfer of property for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, health, safety, or any other object beneficial to mankind and, therefore, the vesting of such transfers inter vivos may be delayed beyond the period mentioned in s 14. There is no similar relaxation of the rule against perpetuities laid down in s 114 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. On the contrary, s 118 of that Act imposes an additional restriction on charitable or religious bequests by a person who has near relations.

(4) Charitable Trusts

The exception enacted in this section is based on the English law as to charitable trusts. Charitable trusts are trusts for purposes enumerated in the Statute of Charitable Trusts 43 Elix c 4, and those so far analogous as to be within the spirit and intentment of the statute. These purposes have been classified by Lord Macnaghten in the leading case of Commrs of Income Tax v Pemsel<sup>3</sup> as (1) for the relief of poverty; (2) for the advancement of education; (3) for the advancement of religion; and (4) other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads. A gift merely for the encouragement of sport is not a charity.<sup>4</sup> However, sport may be beneficial to the community and so a gift of playing fields, parks and gymnasiums to promote the health and welfare of the working classes is a charity.<sup>5</sup> So also is a gift for the constitution of a regimental fund for the promotion of outdoor sport, as tending to increase the physical efficiency of the army;<sup>6</sup> or a gift to maintain a library for an officers mess, as tending to increase the mental efficiency of the army<sup>7</sup> or to buy a site for building a public hall,<sup>8</sup> but not so a gift for maintenance of property for the benefit of distinguished visitors to neighbourhood.<sup>9</sup> A bequest for relief to the infirm, sick and aged Roman Catholic priests<sup>10</sup> or for the benefit of the choir<sup>11</sup> has been upheld as a charitable bequest as tending to advance religion. However, a gift to 'such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England' has been held void for uncertainty by the House of Lords.<sup>12</sup> A gift for the benefit of a volunteer corps has been held to be a charity.<sup>13</sup> A gift for feeding poor pilgrims, distribution of oil among them and saying prayers has also been held in India to be for the benefit of the public within the meaning of this section.<sup>14</sup> A bequest to two charities and to the respective vicars and wardens of two named churches for 'parish work' has been held by the House of Lords as not charitable.<sup>15</sup>

(5) Indian Succession Act

Illustration of religious or charitable uses --

The word 'charitable' does not occur in this section, but the transfers to which it refers are the same as those described in s 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, as trusts created for a public purpose of a charitable or religious nature. The illustration to s 118 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, gives the following list of bequests for religious or charitable uses; the relief of poor people; the maintenance of sick soldiers; the erection or support of a hospital, the education and preferment of orphans; the support of scholars; the erection or support of a school; the building and repair of a bridge; the making of roads, the erection or support of a church; the repairs of a church, the benefit of ministers of religion, and the formation or support of a public garden. However, in John Vallamtom v Union of India,<sup>16</sup> the Supreme Court has declared that s 118 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 as unconstitutional and violative of art 14 of the Constitution of India.

Gifts for charitable uses have been the subject of restrictive legislation in England, ie, the Mortmain Act 1736, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts of 1888 and 1891. These Acts do not apply in India.<sup>17</sup> but there is a respective provision in s 118 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, designed to prevent deathbed gifts by will to religious or charitable uses by persons having near relations.<sup>18</sup> It is rather anomalous, as pointed out by ACJ Ameer Ali in MAF Halfhyde v CA Saldanha,<sup>19</sup> that no protection is given to the near relations against death-bed gifts to non-religious or non-charitable uses. There is no such restrictive provision with regard to gifts inter vivos.

Charitable trusts which create interest in praesenti are not subject to the rule against perpetuity in England in the sense that property may be tied up for an indefinite period for a charitable purpose.<sup>20</sup> In England property may also be tied up indefinitely for even a non-charitable purpose, eg where there is an unfettered gift in praesenti to a perpetual institution so that the corpus and income may be used by the institution as and when it pleases.<sup>21</sup>

In England, these are exceptions to the rule against perpetuities in so far as it deals with estates or interests in praesenti. But charitable trusts to arise in futuro are no exceptions to the English rule which deals with estates or interests in futuro. Therefore, a gift to charity upon a remote event is void,<sup>22</sup> except in the one case of a gift over from one charity to another.<sup>23</sup> This last mentioned exception in English law was followed by a judge of Calcutta High Court in the case of a will where there was a bequest to a charity, and a bequest over upon a remote event to another charity.<sup>24</sup> But in later case,<sup>25</sup> a division bench of the same High Court while construing the same will, held that the positive language of the Indian Succession Act 1925 precluded the application of that exception in English law, and that the rule against remoteness of vesting in s 101 of the Indian Succession Act 1865 (s 114 of the 1925 Act) applied to charitable bequests. The court further observed that as to gifts inter vivos, the TP Act had relaxed the rule against remoteness of vesting in the case of charities. This is undoubtedly correct. Not only is a gift inter vivos, to charity upon a remote event valid, but as the rule in s 16 is also relaxed, a gift to charity after prior interests which fails under ss 13 and 14 would be valid. Thus, A settles property on his son and his son's intended wife successively for their lives, and then on their eldest son for his life, and then on the eldest son of such eldest son for his life and then to a charity. The gift to charity would be valid though, if the ultimate beneficiary were not a charity, the gift would fail under s 16 as the prior interests of the son and grandson are void under ss 13 and 14.

(6) Religion

A gift for the advancement of religion is recognized in the section as entitled to the exemption. A gift in perpetuity for the performance of masses for the soul of the donor was held to be bad in one case,<sup>26</sup> and good in another.<sup>27</sup>

A permanent bequest by a Parsi for the performance of muktad ceremonies is valid, for such ceremonies include prayers for the spiritual welfare of all Zoroastrians, and tend to the advancement of Zoroastrain religion.<sup>28</sup>

The gate of the properties which are gifted in contravention of the rule against perpetuities, in cases where properties are given away partly by way of religious endowments, and partly for the benefit of certain individuals for their use, may be stated thus:

If the terms of the document under which the properties or their income are gifted, amount to their complete dedication for religious or charitable purposes, then any part thereof which is given by way of gift to any person contrary to the rules against perpetuities enures to the benefit of the endowment and becomes part of properties endowed. But on the other hand, if the dedication is partial, such part which is hit by the rule against perpetuities reverts to the donor or his heirs.<sup>29</sup>

(7) Health

A bequest by an Englishman to a hospital was held to be exempt from the rule against perpetuity.<sup>30</sup>

(8) Beneficial to mankind

The question whether any particular object is for the benefit of the public so as to exempt it from the rule against perpetuity, must be determined with reference to the terms of this section. It is submitted that the words 'beneficial to mankind' must be construed eiusdem generis, and as referring to objects of a nature analogous to those specified.

(9) Hindu law

Since the amending Act of 1929, the section applies to Hindus, but the Hindu law has always regarded gifts for religious or charitable purposes as exempt from the rule against perpetuity.<sup>31</sup> A Hindu can make a permanent endowment for maintaining a sadavrat for giving food to travellers;<sup>32</sup> or for the performance of religious ceremonies;<sup>33</sup> or for the endowment of a university,<sup>34</sup> or of a hospital;<sup>35</sup> or a sadavrat for giving food to Brahmins.<sup>36</sup> He may even make a permanent gift for the establishment and worship of an idol,<sup>37</sup> as the English law as to superstitious uses does not apply in India.<sup>38</sup> A gift in favour of an idol which would be invalid in English law is not only lawful,<sup>39</sup> but is highly commendable in Hindu law.<sup>40</sup> However, if the object of the gift is uncertain it cannot take effect; and so the Privy Council have held that a gift for dharma is void, the word meaning law, virtue, legal or moral duty.<sup>41</sup> For the same reason, a gift for the spread of the Hindu religion has been held to be void.<sup>42</sup> A direction for accumulation of income for charitable purposes is valid in Hindu law, although it infringes the rule against perpetuity.<sup>43</sup>

(10) Mahomedan law

The section does not apply to Mahomedans, but Mahomedan law allows property to be tied up in perpetuity for religious or charitable purposes. A permanent dedication of property to such objects is called a wakf. Instances of wakf are set out in Mulla's Mahomedan Law. Mahomedan law allows property to be tied up in perpetuity by family settlement, provided the ultimate gift after the extinction of the family is to charity. Such illusory wakf were held by the Privy Council to be invalid,<sup>44</sup> but the practice has received legislative sanction in the Mussulman Wakf Validating Act 1913, to which retrospective effect has been given by Act 32 of 1930.<sup>45</sup> A direction for the accumulation of income infringing the law against perpetuity has been held valid in a wakf.<sup>46</sup>

Vested interest

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person without specifying the time when it is to take effect, or in terms specifying that it is to take effect forthwith or on the happening of an event which must happen, such interest is vested, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

A vested interest is not defeated by the death of the transferee before he obtains possession.

Explanation.

--An intention that an interest shall not be vested is not to be inferred merely from a provision whereby the enjoyment thereof is postponed, or whereby a prior interest in the same property is given or reserved to some other person, or whereby income arising from the property is directed to be accumulated until the time of enjoyment arrives, or from a provision that if a particular event shall happen the interest shall pass to another person.

(1) Vested Interest

Vested interests as defined in this section are to be distinguished from contingent interests as defined in s 21. Where an interest is vested, the transfer is complete, but when an interest is contingent, the transfer depends upon a condition precedent. When that condition is fulfilled, the transfer takes effect and the interest is vested. If the condition refers to an event, which is certain to occur, the interest dependent upon it is not contingent, but is vested. If it is an uncertain event, it is contingent, for the condition may never be fulfilled and the transfer may never take effect. Thus, a gift to A on the death of B creates a vested interest in A even during B's lifetime, for there is nothing more certain than death. However, a gift to A on the marriage of B creates only a contingent interest, for B may never marry; but that contingent interest becomes vested if and when B marries.

The distinction between a vested and a contingent interest may seem simple, but in practice, it is not always easy to distinguish the one from the other. The difficulty arises from the fact that a vested interest is not necessarily in possession. An interest may be vested and not yet in possession in any one of the three cases referred to in the explanation, ie, (1) by a provision postponing enjoyment; or (2) by the intervention of a prior interest; or (3) by a provision for accumulation. Again, an interest may be vested although, it is liable to be divested by a condition subsequent. The difference between a condition precedent and a condition subsequent is that when the condition is precedent, the estate is not in the grantee until the condition is performed, but when the condition is subsequent the estate vests immediately in the grantee, and remains in him till the condition is broken. Conditions subsequent are dealt with in ss 28 and 31. The question whether an interest is vested or contingent arises most frequently in wills, and is best explained by the illustrations to the corresponding section in the Indian Succession Act 1925 quoted below.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925--Illustrations of Vested Interest

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 119. To it are appended the following illustrations:

- (i) A bequeaths to B 100 rupees, to be paid to him at the death of C. On A's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B, and if he dies before C, his representatives are entitled to the legacy.

- (ii) A bequeaths to B 100 rupees, to be paid upon his attaining the age of 18. On A's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B.
- (iii) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B. On the testator's death, the legacy to B becomes vested in interest in B.
- (iv) A fund is bequeathed to A until B attains the age of 18 and then to B. The legacy to B is vested in interest from the testator's death.
- (v) A bequeaths the whole of his property to B upon trust to pay certain debts out of the income, and then to make over the fund to C. At A's death the gift to C becomes vested in interest in him.
- (vi) A fund is bequeathed to A, B and C in equal shares to be paid to them on their attaining the age of 18, respectively, with a proviso that, if all of them die under the age of 18, the legacy shall devolve upon D. On the death of the testator, the shares vested in interest in A, B and C, subject to be divested in case A, B and C shall all die under 18, and, upon the death of any of them (except the last survivor) under the age of 18, his vested interest passes, so subject, to his representatives.

In illustration (i), the interest of B takes effect on the happening of an event that this is certain, and so it is vested.

In illustration (ii), the interest is one of which the enjoyment is postponed. It illustrates the well-settled rule that the words 'to be paid' or 'payable' at a certain age do not render a bequest contingent.<sup>47</sup> On the other hand, a gift 'at' a certain age, or 'if' or 'when' a certain age is attained, or upon attaining a certain age, is contingent,<sup>48</sup> as is shown by the second illustration to s 120 of the Indian Succession Act 1925.<sup>49</sup>

In illustration (iii), a prior interest intervenes, but the legacy is vested as the determination of that prior interest is a certain event.

In illustration (iv), it might be supposed that B's interest was contingent on his attaining the age of 18, but it is construed as a gift to A for a term of years with remainder to B. It rests on the principle that the law favours the vesting of estates. In Re Blackwell,<sup>50</sup> MR Pollock quoted with approval the following passage from Hawkins on Wills:

In the construction of devises of real estates, it has long been an established rule for the guidance of courts ... that all estates are to be helden vested, except estates in the devise of which a condition precedent is so clearly expressed, that the court cannot treat them as vested without deciding in the direct opposition to the terms of the will.

In this matter the law in India makes no distinction between real and personal property. The rule applies here both to immovable and movable property.

In illustration (v), there is a divestment after the payment of debts. Jarman says that such a devise confers an immediately vested interest, the payment of debt constituting only a charge.<sup>51</sup> In Rajes Kanta Roy v Santi Debi,<sup>52</sup> similar issue has been dealt with.

In illustration (vi), the words 'to be paid' import (as in illus (ii)) a vested interest, but that interest, is liable to be divested on the happening of the event specified and vested in another person. This is an instance of a conditional limitation, ie an interest liable to be divested by a condition subsequent and vested in some one else. Conditional limitations are the subject of s 28.

(3) Enjoyment Postponed

A condition postponing enjoyment does not prevent the interest vesting immediately; but it is itself void for repugnancy after the transferee has attained majority.<sup>53</sup>

Illustration

A transfers property to B in trust for C, and directs B to give possession of the property to C when he attains the age of 25. C has a vested interest and is entitled to possession at the age of 18.

The appointment of an executor or guardian during the minority of the devisee with a direction to hand over the property on his attaining majority does not postpone the vesting of the bequest.<sup>54</sup> When the rights of an adopted son are curtailed by an agreement giving the widow of the adoptive father the right to enjoy the property during her lifetime, the interest of the son is a vested interest which he can dispose off.<sup>55</sup>

ILLUSTRATION

A executed a deed of gift in favour of B, but directed that B was not to take possession of a portion of the property until after the deaths of A and A's wife. B has a vested interest, enjoyment only being postponed.<sup>56</sup>

(4) Prior interest

A prior interest does not postpone the vesting of the subsequent interest. This is the case put in illust (iii) to s 119 of the Indian Succession Act 1925: 'A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B. On the testator's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B.' The expression 'after his death' refers to the time when the gift becomes reduced to possession, and not to the time when the interest vests. A bequest to A from and after his attaining the age of 18 is prima facie contingent, because it is postponed until the happening of an event which may never happen. But a bequest to B for life and then to A from and after the death of B vests immediately in A, for enjoyment is postponed until the termination of a life estate, an event which must happen.<sup>57</sup> In Rewun Persad v Radha Beeby<sup>58</sup> a case decided under Hindu law, the testator gave his wife a life estate, and after her death one moiety of the estate to his brother B, and the other moiety to his sons C and D. B and C died during the lifetime of the widow, but as their shares were vested, and as C and D took as tenants in common, C's widow was entitled to succeed to C's share. In Bhagabati v Kali Charan<sup>59</sup> the bequest was to the mother for life, then to the wife for her life, and then to the nephews, and it was held that the nephews took a vested and transmittable interest on the death of the testator. In Chunilal v Bai Muli<sup>60</sup> there was a bequest to a widow for life and then to a daughter, and the daughter took an immediate vested interest.

Illustration

Property is settled in trust for A for life with a direction to the trustees to pay A Rs 2,000 a year out of rents and profits and to apply the balance to the discharge of a mortgage; and after A's death to convey the land to B. Although B may not survive, yet B's interest is vested in A's lifetime.<sup>61</sup>

A question arose before the Supreme Court in Rajes Kanta Roy v Santi Debi<sup>62</sup> as to whether the interest which devolved upon two minor sons under a settlement made by the father was vested or contingent. The settlement provided in substance that the sons would obtain an absolute interest upon the death of the father, and after discharging the debts of the father. The court observed that the settlor clearly contemplated that there would be, as infact, there was, a surplus after the payment of the debts, and held:

Now there can be no doubt about the rule that where the enjoyment of the property is postponed but the present income thereof is to be applied for the benefit of the donee, the gift is vested and not contingent.... .This rule operates normally where the entire income is applied for the benefit of the donee. The distinguishing feature in this case is that it is not the entire income that is available to the donees for their actual use but only a portion thereof. But it is to be observed that according to the scheme of the trust-deed, the reason for limiting the enjoyment of the income to a specified sum thereof, is obviously in order to facilitate and bring about the discharge of the debts. As already explained the underlying scheme of the trust-deed is that the enjoyment is to be restricted until the debts are discharged. Whatever may be said of such a provision where a donee is not himself a person who is under any legal obligation aliunde to discharge such debts, the position in this case is different. The two sons are themselves persons who, if the testator died intestate, would be under an obligation to discharge his debts out of the properties which devolve upon them. It is only the surplus which would be legally available for division between them. In such a case, the balance of the income which is meant to be applied for the discharge of the debts is also an application for the income for the benefit of the donees. These arrangements taken together clearly indicate that what is postponed is not the very vesting of the property in the lots themselves but that the enjoyment of the income thereof is burdened with certain monthly payments and with the obligation to discharge debts therefrom notionally pro rata all of which taken together constitute application of the income for his benefit.<sup>63</sup>

The court also relied on the provision that if either of the sons died before the discharge of the debts, his heirs were entitled to the share of the son, which was a further indication that the interest of the sons was a vested interest.

(5) Accumulation of Income

A direction for accumulation of income if in excess of the period sanctioned by s 17 is invalid for the excess. Within the limits sanctioned by the section, it is a provision for the postponement of enjoyment; and as such it does not postpone the vesting of the interest.<sup>64</sup> The first illustration to s 56 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882 shows that a direction for the accumulation of the income of a minor is ineffective after he attains majority.

(6) Conditional Limitation

A provision that if a particular event shall happen the interest shall pass to another person is what is called in English law a conditional limitation. A conditional limitation divests an estate which has vested, and vests it in another person. A condition subsequent divests an estate which has vested and revests it in the grantor. Section 28 deals with conditional limitations, while conditions subsequent are dealt with in s 31.

A conditional limitation, therefore, does not prevent an estate from vesting; on the contrary, the condition itself implies that the estate which preceded it had vested. This is explained in Sundar Bibi v Rajendra Narain.<sup>65</sup> In that case, the terms of a compromise provided that L should have an estate for life, and that after his death R was to be full owner of the estate, if he survived L; but that if he did not survive L, the estate would pass to lineal male descendants of R according to the rule of primogeniture. Before the death of L the question arose whether R had only a contingent interest, or a vested interest which could be attached. Now if the provision had been merely this that the estate would pass to R, if he survived L and nothing more had been said, there can be no doubt that R would have had an estate contingent on his surviving L. But the further provision of a gift over to another person was a conditional limitation, which had the effect of vesting the estate in R. The reason given by the court was that the condition affected the retention of the interest, and not in its acquisition. R, therefore, took a vested interest liable to be divested if he did not survive L. A very similar case is Raja Lal Bahadur v Rajendra Narain.<sup>66</sup> A compromise between two brothers L and R provided that L was to have a life interest and that if R survived L, R would be 'permanent owner with power of transfer and transmitting inheritance', but that if R did not so survive, 'his male descendants according to the rule of lineal primogeniture will be entitled to the said property'. This was held to confer, not contingent, but an immediate vested interest in R, although the estate tail in the event of R not surviving L was probably invalid. A condition precedent followed by a gift over is generally construed as a conditional limitation so as to favour the vesting of the prior estate.

(7) Time of Vesting

As soon as the transfer is complete, the interest vests. Words are to be construed according to their ordinary meaning, and no particular form of words is necessary to effect a vesting.<sup>67</sup>

(8) Power of Appointment

A power of appointment confers upon the donee of the power, a right of disposition of the property of the creator of the power, ie, the appointor. The power may be either general, to appoint to any one the donee pleases, or special, to appoint anyone of a specified class of persons. The appointee, or person in whose favour the donee exercises the power derives title from the creator of the power, and not from the donee. However, the property vests when the power is exercised, and not when it is created.<sup>68</sup> Until the power is exercised the property does not vest in the donee of the power; but if there is an independent gift to a class with a power to apportion the shares of each member of the class, the property vests by virtue of the gift even though the power is not exercised.<sup>69</sup> Again, the power may be such that it is the duty of the donee to exercise it, and in that case if there is no gift over,<sup>70</sup> the court will imply a gift for the objects of the power.<sup>71</sup>

(9) Contrary Intention

The grantor may, however, specify the time of vesting;<sup>72</sup> for under s 5 a transfer may be not only in the present, but also in the future.<sup>73</sup> However, the time of vesting cannot be beyond the period allowed by the rule against perpetuity. A deed of settlement gave life estate to X, with remainder to his children not in existence at the time of settlement. It was held that the interest of the children was a contingent one. Unborn children could be beneficiaries under the trust, but they could claim a vested interest only after the death of the holder of the life estate.<sup>74</sup>

(10) Death of Transferee

When an interest is vested, it becomes the property of the transferee and is, under s 6, transferable by him even before he has obtained possession; for a transfer of property not in possession is effective. If the transferee dies, his interest vests in his representatives, irrespective of whether he has obtained possession.<sup>75</sup> One of the factors for determining whether an interest is vested or contingent, is whether the property devolves on the heirs of the transferee or reverts to the estate.<sup>76</sup>

(11) Hindu Law

The amendment of s 2 makes s 19 applicable to Hindus. Section 106 of the Indian Succession Act 1865, was applied to Hindu wills by the Hindu Wills Act 1870; and s 119 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 is applied to some Hindu wills by s 57, and schedule III of the same Act. The principle of the section has always been recognized by Hindu law, and some of the cases noted were decided under that law. The case of Gosling v Gosling<sup>77</sup> has been followed in cases decided under Hindu law. Thus, in Gosavi Shivgar v Rivettcarnac<sup>78</sup> there was a bequest of property to a minor with a direction that it should not be given to him till he attained the age of 30, but the direction was held to be inoperative after he attained majority. On the other hand, as there was a charge on the income for the maintenance of another disciple, the trustee was allowed to retain the corpus till the age of 30, paying the devisee the whole income subject to the charge. In Ram Kaur v Atma Singh,<sup>79</sup> the testator devised his estate to his sons and directed that the widow should manage it during her lifetime, but it had held that the estate vested immediately in the sons, and as the widow was given no prior interest, they were entitled to immediate possession. On the other hand, in Srinivasa v Dandayudapani,<sup>80</sup> there was a bequest to a daughter with a direction to enjoy the income and pass the corpus intact to her son. The daughter took a vested interest, but the direction was ineffective and the son who predeceased her took no interest at all. It has also been held under a Hindu law that the creation of partial trusts and charges will not postpone the vesting in possession.<sup>81</sup> When a testator made a provision for an allowance to his widow and directed the estate to be divided by the executors between themselves at her death, the executors took an immediate vested interest although they died before the widow.<sup>82</sup> A bequest to a daughter of a house after the mortgage debt has been paid is not contingent, but creates a present vested interest.<sup>83</sup>

In Palchuri Hanumayamma v Tadikamalla Kotilingam,<sup>84</sup> the Supreme Court found s 19 to be inapplicable on facts due to enactment of s 14 of the Hindu Succession Act 1956. In this case, as per the will, the testator's wife was to manage the property allotted to her daughters during her lifetime, and after her lifetime the properties identified as individual shares of the three daughters were to be inherited by the said daughters. However, during her lifetime, the testator's wife disposed of the entire property to the exclusion of one of the daughters. It was held that due to enactment of s 14 prior to the testator's wife's death, her right got enlarged into an absolute estate and she became an absolute owner of the property and, therefore, s 19 has no relevance.

(12) Mahomedan Law

Sunni law does not recognize an estate for life with a vested remainder.<sup>85</sup> There is some doubt as to whether the law on this point has been altered by the decision of the Privy Council in Amjad Khan v Ashraf Khan.<sup>86</sup> It led to a difference of opinion in a case decided by Bombay High Court.<sup>87</sup> Such estates are recognized in Shia law,<sup>88</sup> and in the case of a talukdari estate owned by a Mahomedan family in Oudh.<sup>89</sup> A life estate with a vested remainder is recognised both for Shias and Sunnis by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act 1913, in the case of wakfs.

When unborn person acquires vested interest on transfer for his benefit

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not then living, he acquires upon his birth, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer, a vested interest, although he may not be entitled to the enjoyment thereof immediately on his birth.

There is no ban on the transfer of interest in favour of an unborn person. Section 20 permits an interest being created for the benefit of an unborn person who acquires interest upon his birth.<sup>90</sup>

(1) When Unborn Person Acquires Vested Interest on Transfer for His Benefit

An interest created for the benefit of an unborn person vests as soon as that person is born. Thus, if A settles property on himself and his intended wife for their joint lives and then on the eldest son of their marriage, the son takes a vested interest as soon as he is born. It does not matter that he is not entitled to possession during the lifetime of his parents. Nor will the vesting be affected by a provision that if his parents die during his minority, the trustees should not deliver possession to him until he attains majority.

Under s 13 it is necessary that the estate which vests in the unborn person must be the whole remainder. In English law, it is possible to limit an estate to A for life, then to A's unborn eldest son for life, and then to B. In this case until A's son is born the estate vests in A with a contingent remainder to his son, and with a vested remainder to B. But as soon as the son is born, the estate is in A with a vested remainder to the son, with a vested remainder to B. However, under this Act, the interest of the son fails by reason of s 13, and that of B fails under s 16. Where, however, a disposition by A is to his grandson B, and such of C's sons as were born when B attained majority, the disposition is not hit by s 13. C's son who was born after the disposition, but before B attained majority, obtains a vested interest under this section on his birth.<sup>91</sup>

A contrary intention that the estate shall not vest at birth may appear as when the interest is contingent, eg a transfer to A and B for their joint lives, and then to the son of their intended marriage who shall first attain the age of 18 years.

Under Hindu law as amended by statute, no transfer or bequest by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such disposition.

Contingent interest

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person to take effect only on the happening of a specified uncertain event, or if a specified uncertain event shall not happen, such person thereby acquires a contingent interest in the property. Such interest becomes a vested interest, in the former case, on the happening of the event, in the latter, when the happening of the event becomes impossible.

Exception.

--Where, under a transfer of property, a person becomes entitled to an interest therein upon attaining a particular age, and the transferor also gives to him absolutely the income to arise from such interest before he reaches that age, or directs the income or so much thereof as may be necessary to be applied for his benefit, such interest is not contingent.

(1) Contingent Interest

The distinction between a contingent interest and a vested interest has been explained in note (1) to s 19. If the transfer is subject to a condition precedent, there is no transfer at all until the condition is fulfilled. Till then the interest is contingent on the condition being fulfilled. When the condition is fulfilled, the transfer takes effect and the interest becomes vested.<sup>92</sup>

The specified uncertain event may be one which depends upon the will of the intended transferee, eg execution of a deed, or payment of a sum of money. The performance of such conditions is the subject of s 26.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925--Illustrations of Contingent Interest

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 120. The following are the illustrations to that section:

- (i) A legacy is bequeathed to D in case A, B and C shall all die under the age of 18; D has a contingent interest in the legacy until A, B and C die under 18, or one of them attains that age.
- (ii) A sum of money is bequeathed to A "in case he shall attain the age of 18" or 'when he shall attain the age of 18'. A's interest in the legacy is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by his attaining that age.
- (iii) An estate is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B if B shall then be living; but if B shall not then be living to C. A, B and C survive the testator, B and C each take a contingent interest in the estate until the event which is to vest it in one or in the other has happened.
- (iv) An estate is bequeathed as in the last case supposed. B dies in the lifetime of A and C. Upon the death of B, C acquires a vested right to obtain possession of the estate upon A's death.
- (v) A legacy is bequeathed to A when she shall attain the age of 18, or shall marry under that age with the consent of B, with a proviso that, if she neither attains 18 nor marries under that age with B's consent, the legacy shall go to C. A and C each take a contingent interest in the legacy. A on attaining the age of majority, becomes absolutely entitled to the legacy although she may have married under 18 without the consent of B.
- (vi) An estate is bequeathed to A until he shall marry and after that event to B. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by A's marrying.
- (vii) An estate is bequeathed to A until he shall take advantage of any law for the relief of insolvent debtors, and after that event, to B. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until A takes advantage of such a law.
- (viii) An estate is bequeathed to A if he shall pay 500 rupees to B. A's interest in the bequest is contingent until he has paid 500 rupees to B.
- (ix) A leaves his farm of Sultanpur Khurd to B, if B shall convey his own farm of Sultanpur Buzurg to C. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until he has conveyed the latter farm to C.
- (x) A fund is bequeathed to A if B shall not marry C within five years after the testator's death. A's interest in the legacy is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by the expiration of the five years without B's having married C, or by the occurrence within that period of an event which makes the fulfilment of the condition impossible.

- (xi) A fund is bequeathed to A if B shall not make any provision for him by will. The legacy is contingent until B's death.
- (xii) A bequeaths to B 500 rupees a year upon his attaining the age of 18, and directs that the interest, or a component part thereof, shall be applied for his benefit until he reaches that age. The legacy is vested.
- (xiii) A bequeaths to B 500 rupees when he shall attain the age of 18, and directs that a certain sum, out of another fund, shall be applied for his maintenance until he arrives at that age. The legacy is contingent.

In Illust(ii), the instances that a bequest 'at' a given age,<sup>93</sup> or 'upon attaining' or 'as' the legatee shall attain, or 'after' his attaining a given age is prima facie contingent.<sup>94</sup>

In illust (v), the conditions are in the alternative and it is sufficient if one is fulfilled.<sup>95</sup>

In illust (vii), the condition of defeasance on insolvency is a condition subsequent as regards A, but a condition precedent as regards B. Such a condition is invalid in a transfer inter vivos.<sup>96</sup>

In illust (x), the condition is a negative condition which is discharged by the event becoming impossible. The marriage of B and C would be rendered impossible by the death of either party or by the marriage of B or C with another person.<sup>97</sup>

In illust (xii) and (xiii), the exception to the section is referred to.

In illust (xiii), the income is of another fund, and so the exception does not apply.

(3) Additional Instances of Contingent Interest

The following are some of the decisions on contingent interest illustrating contingent interests occurring in wills:

- (1) Bequest to a daughter for life and after her death to her lawful children who being a son shall attain the age of 21, or who being a daughter shall attain that age or marry--held that the interest of a son was contingent till he attained the age of 21 and then became vested.<sup>98</sup>
- (2) Bequests to five sons in equal shares with a condition that in the event of any son dying without sons or son's sons, his share will be taken by the surviving sons--held that each son gets a life-estate, but the absolute estate of each son was contingent on his leaving a son or a son's son upon death.<sup>99</sup>
- (3) Bequests to wife and son whom she was empowered to adopt, with a provision that if she died without adopting a son or if the son died in her lifetime, the estate should pass to a sister's son. Held that the nephew had a contingent interest which was vested when the adopted son died without issue in the lifetime of the widow.<sup>1</sup>

(4) Condition Precedent Construed as a Condition Subsequent

A condition precedent, when followed by a gift over, is sometimes construed as a condition subsequent so that the interest dependent on it is not contingent, but vested. Thus, a devise to A 'if' or 'when' he attains the age of majority, with a gift over in the event of his dying under that age, has been held to be a condition subsequent so that A takes a vested interest liable to be divested by his death under the age specified. Similarly, a devise to A if or when he shall attain a given age, with a limitation over on his death under that age without issue, confers a vested estate on A defeasible only in the event of his death without issue under the specified age.<sup>2</sup> The English Courts have adopted two rules of construction, namely: (1) that the gift of income of the same fund, until the contingency happens, to the very person who will on attaining a particular age take the fund makes the gift of the fund, apparently contingent upon the attainment of that age, a vested interest; and (2) that a gift over upon failure of a prior gift may have the effect of converting the prior gift apparently contingent upon attaining of a particular age into a vested interest, subject to be divested on the death before that age. The first of the above two rules of constructions have been adopted in India by the exception to s 21. The second rule has not been adopted in any section of TP Act or the Indian Succession Act 1925. It is submitted that in such circumstances, there is no reason for importing here the second rule about which the English courts have taken divergent views. This opinion has been expressed in a case of Calcutta High Court.<sup>3</sup>

(5) Spes Successionis

A mere spes successionis is neither a contingent interest, nor a vested interest.<sup>4</sup>

(6) Exception

Illustrations of the exceptions are given in s 120 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, and have already been quoted in note (2) above and illust (xii) and illust (xiii), and contrasted in illust (xii) with illust (xiii). Under the exception, there must be either a gift of the interest, or a direction to apply it. The gift of interest in a legacy involves an immediate gift, for the particular legacy has to be immediately separated from the bulk of the property in order to provide for the interest.<sup>5</sup> If there is no gift of the income, there must be a direction to apply it for the benefit of the minor. However, in order that a case falls within the exception, it is necessary that the direction relates to the whole of the income.<sup>6</sup>

The exception in the corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1865, was considered in a case before the Privy Council.<sup>7</sup> A Parsi by will appointed his brother his executor, and directed him to bring up and maintain the child which his wife was expecting, and to maintain himself and the family 'out of my property and effects.' If the child was a son, the will directed that he 'shall be cherished and maintained and educated and when he comes of age my executor shall make over the whole of my remaining properties to my son.' Their Lordships held that the case was not within the exception because, (1) there is no gift out of any ascertainable fund to the son; (2) the executor was to maintain not only the son, but also the whole family; and (3) he was entitled to spend not only the income, but also the corpus. It has been held that the exception applies only to the case where a fund is given to a person 'on his attaining a particular age.' It has no relation to any other contingency eg his surviving a named person.<sup>8</sup>

The exception has no reference to gifts to a contingent class, and it is submitted that in India the principle of the exception cannot be extended to a gift to a contingent class.<sup>9</sup>

Transfer to members of a class who attain a particular age.

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of such members only of a class as shall attain a particular age, such interest does not vest in any member of the class who has not attained that age.

(1) Contingent class

The case dealt with in this section is a gift to a contingent class. This is not the same thing as a gift to a class on a contingency. Thus, a gift to the children of A in case B dies without issue, is a gift to a class on a contingency. However, a gift to such of the children of A who shall attain the age of 18, is a gift to a contingent class. No child of A has vested interest until he has attained that age,<sup>10</sup> and until then he does not completely answer the description of the transferee.<sup>11</sup> Until then his interest is contingent even though there may be a gift over.

(2) Ascertainment of Class

For the ascertainment of a class, the rule is that the objects of the testator's bounty should be ascertained as soon as possible. In the case of a gift to the children of A when they attain the age of 18, the class is ascertained when the first child of A attains 18, and no child born after that time can take.<sup>12</sup> Similarly, if the gift is to A for life, and then to such of B's children as attain the age of 18, then if a child of B has attained the age of 18 in A's lifetime, the class is ascertained on the death of A, and no child born after A's death can take.<sup>13</sup> In the first case, the class consists of the children of A who are in existence when the first child of A attains the age of 18. In the second case, the class consists of the children of B in existence at the death of A, provided one of them has attained the age of 18 in the lifetime of A. If no child of B has attained the age of 18 in the lifetime of A, any child of B born before the first child of B reaches 18 becomes a member of the class subject to his attaining the age of 18 years.

(3) Not Contingent

If the gift is to the children of A to be divided among them when they attain the age of 18, there is no contingency at all, and the children take an immediate vested interest,<sup>14</sup> and enjoyment only is postponed.

(4) Indian Succession Act 1925

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 121. The illustration to that section is as follows:

A fund is bequeathed to such of the children of A as shall attain the age of 18, with a direction that, while any child of A shall be under the age of 18, the income of the share, to which it may be presumed he will be eventually entitled, shall be applied to his maintenance and education. No child of A who is under the age of 18 has a vested interest in the bequest.

(5) Exception to s 21 Not Applicable to Contingent Class

The above illustration under s 121 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 can be compared with illust (xii) under s 120 of that Act which explains the meaning of the exception to the last mentioned section. It is clear that the exception to s 120 does not apply in the case of a bequest to a contingent class, for despite the provision for maintenance, the interest is not vested. Although no illustrations are given under ss 21 or 22 of the TP Act, the meaning of those sections must be the same as those of the corresponding ss 120 and 121 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 as explained by the illustrations. It follows, therefore, that the exception to s 21 does not apply in the case of a contingent class, for despite a provision for maintenance, the share is not vested. It has been so held in a case by Calcutta High Court.<sup>15</sup> In De Souza v Vaz<sup>16</sup> J Farran said--

The same rule, however, does not apply where there is a gift of an entire fund payable to a class of persons equally upon their attaining a certain age. There a direction to apply the income of the whole fund, in the meantime, for their maintenance does not create a vested interest in a member of the class who does not attain that age.

Transfer contingent on happening of specified uncertain event

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is to accrue to a specified person if a specified uncertain event shall happen, and no time is mentioned for the occurrence of that event, the interest fails unless such event happens before, or at the same time as, the intermediate or precedent interest ceases to exist.

(1) Subsequent Contingent Interest

The case put in this section is that of a prior interest followed by a subsequent contingent interest. The contingent interest cannot vest until the event on which it is contingent happens. If that happens sometime after the prior interest has determined, there is a gap or interval during which the estate would be in suspense and would be a res nullius. The section, therefore, enacts that the contingent interest will fail or cannot vest, unless the event happens before or at the same time as the prior interest ceases. Thus, if there is a gift for life to A, and then to B in case B gets called to the Bar, the gift to B fails, unless he is called to the Bar in the lifetime of A or at the same time as A dies.<sup>17</sup>

The rule in this section corresponds to the English real property rule that every contingent remainder must vest during the continuance of the particular estate which supports it or eo instanti that such particular estate determines.

In a Madras case,<sup>18</sup> the testator disinherited his son, and left his estate to the grandson or grandsons who might be born within 10 years after his death. Justice Ramesam said that the result was that there would be an interval of 10 years after the testator's death during which the estate is not vested in any person, and that for this reason the disposition was void. In Gadadhar Mullick v Official Trustee of Bengal,<sup>19</sup> it was held that the artificial rule of English real property law that every contingent gift must be supported by a prior estate, and that it must vest at least eo instanti the determination of the particular estate which supports it, ought not to be imported to India for Hindu law. Soorjeemony's case<sup>20</sup> and Gadadhar Mullick's case,<sup>21</sup> though cases of contingent bequests in a will, are, it is submitted, applicable to contingent gifts inter vivos governed by Hindu law as unmodified by legislation.<sup>22</sup>

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The section corresponds to s 124 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, according to which if no period is specified, a contingent bequest fails, unless the event on which it is contingent happens before the period of distribution. The following are the illustrations to the section:

- (i) A legacy is bequeathed to A, and in case of his death, to B. If A survives the testator, the legacy to B does not take effect.
- (ii) A legacy is bequeathed to A, and in case of his death without children to B. If A survives the testator or

- dies in his lifetime leaving a child, the legacy to B does not take effect.
- (iii) A legacy is bequeathed to A when and if he attains the age of 18 and, in case of his death, to B. A attains the age of 18. The legacy to B does not take effect.
  - (iv) A legacy is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death to B, 'in case of B's death without children' to C. The words 'in case of B's death without children' are to be understood as meaning in case B dies without children during the lifetime of A.
  - (v) A legacy is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death to B, and, 'in case of B's death' to C. The words 'in case of B's death' are to be considered as meaning 'in case B dies in the lifetime of A'.

In Chunilal v Bai Samrath,<sup>23</sup> where the testator bequeathed his property to his two sons with a proviso that in case of either dying without male issue, his share was to go to the survivor. The gift over to the surviving son was contingent on the death of the other son without male issue. The Privy Council held that the gift over was effective although the other son died two years after the testator. This was a case to which the Hindu Wills Act did not apply; but in other cases in which s 111 of the Indian Succession Act 1865, was applicable, or was made applicable by the Hindu Wills Act, it was held that the prior gift was absolute and indefeasible on the death of the testator.<sup>24</sup>

(3) Section to be Applied Only to Cases Strictly Coming Within its Scope

In Bhupendra v Amarendra,<sup>25</sup> the Judicial Committee observed, with reference to s 11 of the Succession Act 1865, now reproduced in s 124 of the Succession Act 1925, which corresponds to s 23 of this Act:

section 111 embodies the rule enunciated in Edwards v Edwards.<sup>26</sup> The rule of construction laid down in that case has been considerably modified by later English decisions. The Indian Act, however, has given it statutory force .... Their Lordships think that it should be applied only to cases strictly coming within its scope.

In that case, time was mentioned for the occurrence of the specified uncertain event and consequently, s 111 was not applied, for that section applied only when no time was mentioned for the occurrence of the event. It will be noticed that s 23 is concerned with a gift to a specified person upon certain contingency. Although in s 124 of the Succession Act 1925, which corresponds to this section, the expression 'specified person' is not used, the illustration to that section clearly indicates that the contingent bequest contemplated by that section is one to a specified person. Section 23 of TP Act and s 124 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, therefore, like the exceptions to s 21 of TP Act and s 120 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, have no reference to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. It has already been submitted that the exceptions to the last mentioned sections do not apply to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. On a parity of reasoning, s 23 of TP Act and s 124 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 ought not to apply to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. A gift or bequest to a contingent class does not strictly come within the scope of s 23 of TP Act or s 124 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, for those sections are concerned with gifts or bequests to specified persons and, on the authority of the observations of the Judicial Committee quoted above, those sections should not be applied to a gift or bequest to a contingent class.<sup>27</sup>

Transfer to such of certain persons as survive at some period not specified

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is to accrue to such of certain persons as shall be surviving at some period, but the exact period is not specified, the interest shall go to such of them as shall be alive when the intermediate or precedent interest ceases to exist, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers property to B for life, and after his death to C and D, equally to be divided between them, or to survivor of them. C dies during the life of B. D survives B. At B's death the property passes to D.

(1) Gift to Survivor

This section enacts a rule of construction and is best explained by the following passage from the judgment of LJ Turner in White v Barker:<sup>28</sup>

Where there is a bequest to A for life and after his death to B and C or the survivor of them, some meaning must of course be attached to the words 'the survivor.' They may refer to any one of three events -- to one of the persons named surviving the other, or to one of them only surviving the testator, or to one of them only surviving the tenant for life, and in the absence of any indication to the contrary, they are taken to refer to the latter event as being the more probable one to have been referred to.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The corresponding section in the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 125. Under that section, the period of survivorship is the time of payment or distribution, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the will. The general rule is established by the leading case of Cripps v Wolcott,<sup>29</sup> where VC Leach stated the rule as follows:

I consider it, however, to be well settled, that if a legacy be given to two or more, equally to be divided between them, or to the survivor of them, and there is no special intent to be found in the will, that the survivorship is to be referred to the period of division. If there be no previous interest given in the legacy, then the period of division is the death of the testator, and the survivors at his death will take the whole legacy.... But if a previous life estate be given, then the period of division is the death of the tenant for life, and the survivors at his death will take the whole legacy.

The section in the Indian Succession Act 1925 has the following illustrations:

- (i) Property is bequeathed to A and B to be equally divided between them or to the survivor of them. If both, A and B survive the testator, the legacy is equally divided between them. If A dies before the testator, and B survives the testator, it goes to B.
- (ii) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, to be equally divided between them, or to the survivor of them. B dies during the lifetime of A; C survives A. At A's death the legacy goes to C (see the illustration to the present s 24).<sup>30</sup>
- (iii) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, or the survivor, with a direction that, if B should not survive the testator, his children are to stand in his place. C dies during the life of the testator; B survives the testator, but dies in the lifetime of A. The legacy goes to the representative of B.
- (iv) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, with a direction that, in case either of them dies in the lifetime of A, the whole shall go to the survivor. B dies in the lifetime of A. Afterwards, C dies in the lifetime of A. The legacy goes to the representative of C.

In the first illustration, no antecedent interest precedes the gift, and the period of distribution is the death of the testator. In Ellokassee Dassee v Durponarai,<sup>31</sup> the testator left his property to his two sons, an infant grandson, and a widow in equal shares, and directed that 'if any of these four persons happen to die, the survivors of them will receive this estate in equal shares; but if there be a son or grandson surviving as heir and representatives of the party dying, such survivor shall succeed to his share; .... so long as my infant grandson shall not have attained his majority the whole of my estate shall remain undivided.' It was held that the period of distribution was the death of the testator; and if all four persons survived the testator they took vested interests from that date, but that the estate was not divisible until the grandson attained majority.

In the second illustration, the period of division is the death of the life tenant A.<sup>32</sup>

The third illustration is of the 'contrary intention' for although there is a prior interest, the time of distribution is the death of the testator.

The fourth illustration is another instance of 'contrary intention,' for the time of distribution is that of one legatee surviving the other. In the passage already quoted from the judgment in White v Baker,<sup>33</sup> the Lordship continued:

But where, as in the present case, the bequest is to A for life and after his death to B and C, and in case either of them dies in the lifetime of A, the whole to the survivor, it is plain that the words in their natural import refer to one surviving the other.

Conditional transfer

--An interest created on a transfer of property and dependent upon a condition fails if the fulfilment of the condition is impossible, or is forbidden by law, or is of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of any law, or is fraudulent, or involves or implies injury to the person or property of another, or the Court regards it as immoral or opposed to public policy.

Illustrations

- (a) A lets a farm to B on condition that he shall walk a hundred miles in an hour. The lease is void.
- (b) A gives Rs 500 to B on condition that he shall marry A's daughter C. At the date of the transfer C was dead. The transfer is void.
- (c) A transfers Rs 500 to B on condition that she shall murder C. The transfer is void.
- (d) A transfers Rs 500 to his niece C, if she will desert her husband. The transfer is void.

(1)Void Condition Precedent

The expression 'dependent upon a condition' shows that the section refers to conditions precedent. If the condition precedent to a transfer is of the nature described in this section, the transfer fails. Under s 6(h)(2) of TP Act, no transfer can be made for an object or consideration which is unlawful within the meaning of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.

A condition the fulfilment of which is impossible may refer to an act which is impossible in itself, as in the first two illustrations. The conditions the fulfilment of which becomes impossible by the act of the party benefited by the non-fulfilment is dealt with in s 34.

The conditions referred to in this section are conditions which as agreements would be void.

Void conditions subsequent are the subject of s 32. If a condition subsequent is void, the condition fails, but the interest created by the transfer is not affected; while if a condition precedent is void, the transfer fails. A makes a gift of his field to B on condition that he sets fire to C's haystack. This is a void condition precedent, and the gift fails. A makes a gift of his field to B with a proviso that if he does not within a year's time set fire to C's haystack the gift shall be void. This is a void condition subsequent. The gift is a good gift, and is not affected by the void condition.

A gift to which an immoral condition is attached is a good gift, but the condition is void;<sup>34</sup> but a transfer in consideration of future immoral relations is void.<sup>35</sup>

Illust (d) to the section recalls the case of Wilkinson v Wilkinson<sup>36</sup> where it was held that a gift on a condition that a woman should cease to live with her husband is void, as the condition is void as against public policy. In a Bombay case,<sup>37</sup> N advanced money to V, a married woman, to enable her to divorce her husband and marry N. He then sued to recover the advances. The court held that the agreement was against public, policy and void.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The section corresponds to ss 126 and 127 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. A condition in partial restraint of marriage is valid in English law,<sup>38</sup> and this would apparently be so under the Indian Succession Act 1925.<sup>39</sup> A condition in a will that the testator's sons daughter should not take any interest under the will, if she married before the death of the son, was upheld by the Calcutta High Court as not being intended to penalise her marriage, but as being a reasonable disposition having regard to the son's duty to see to his daughter's marriage during his life time.<sup>40</sup> A condition precedent involving a breach of public duty,<sup>41</sup> or in restraint of trade,<sup>42</sup> invalidates a bequest.

An instance of an impossible condition is the case of Rajendra Lal v Mrinalini Dasi.<sup>43</sup> The testator left a legacy on condition that the legatee should excavate a tank, but as he had himself excavated the tank before his death the bequest failed. Justice Mookerjee said that the performance of the condition was the motive of the bequest, and the impracticability of performance barred the claim of the legatee.

Fulfilment of condition precedent

--Where the terms of a transfer of property impose a condition to be fulfilled before a person can take an interest in the property, the condition shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if it has been substantially complied with.

Illustrations

- (a) A transfers Rs 5,000 to B on condition that he shall marry with the consent of C, D and E. E dies. B marries with the consent of C and D. B is deemed to have fulfilled the condition.
- (b) A transfers Rs 5,000 to B on condition that he shall marry with the consent of C, D and E. B marries without the consent of C, D and E but obtains their consent after the marriage. B has not fulfilled the condition.

(1) Performance of Condition Precedent

The law favours the early vesting of estates,<sup>44</sup> and so a condition precedent may be carried out cy pres, and is fulfilled if it is substantially carried out. For the same reason, s 29 enacts that a condition subsequent must be strictly fulfilled in order to prevent the divesting of an estate which was vested. This is well illustrated by a comparison of illust (a) to this section with illust (1) to s 132 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, where the same illustration is put in the form of a condition subsequent thus:

A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, C and D, the legacy shall go to E. D dies. Even if A marries without the consent of B and C, the gift to E does not take effect.

The condition in the above illustration, being a condition subsequent, is strictly construed to prevent the legacy to A being divested; so on the death of D, the condition becomes impossible and void. Therefore, A may neglect it and marry without the consent of B and C. If it were so construed in the illust (a) to s 26 where it is a condition precedent, A would take nothing, for performance of the condition would be impossible. Therefore, the condition is treated as fulfilled by substantial compliance and the transfer to A takes effect, if he marries with the consent of the survivors B and C.

Illustration (a) recalls the case of Dawson v Oliver-Massey,<sup>45</sup> where the condition was marriage with the consent of parents, and the consent of a surviving parent was held to suffice.

Illustration (b) shows that if the condition is clear it cannot be evaded. Where the condition was marriage with the consent of guardians, and the sole guardian appointed by the will had died, and no guardian was appointed, the condition was not complied with, for the court could have on application appointed a guardian.<sup>46</sup>

A condition of residence is valid,<sup>47</sup> and when no manner of residence is prescribed, is complied with by occasional residence.<sup>48</sup> In an Allahabad case,<sup>49</sup> a dispute as to succession between a Mohammedan mother and cousins was compromised on terms that the mother should have an estate for life with power of alienation with the consent of the cousins who were to be the reversionary heirs. After the death of two cousins, the mother effected an alienation with the consent of the survivor. The judges differed as to whether this was a substantial compliance within the meaning of this section. It is submitted, however, that this was not a case of a condition precedent to the vesting of an estate, but merely a condition affecting the mother's authority to alienate, and the section had no application.

(2) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 128. The following are the illustrations to the section:

- (i) A legacy is bequeathed to A on condition that he shall marry with the consent of B, C, D and E. A marries with the written consent of B, C is present at the marriage. D sends a present to A previous to the marriage. E has been personally informed by A of his intentions, and has made no objections. A has fulfilled the condition.
- (ii) A legacy is bequeathed to A on condition that he shall marry with the consent of B, C and D. D dies, and A marries with the consent of B and C. A has fulfilled the condition.
- (iii) A legacy is bequeathed to A on condition that he shall marry with the consent of B, C and D. A marries in the lifetime of B, C and D, with the consent of B and C only. A has not fulfilled the condition.
- (iv) A legacy is bequeathed to A on condition that he shall marry with the consent of B, C and D. A obtains the unconditional assent of B, C and D to his marriage with E. Afterwards, B, C and D capriciously retract their consent. A marries E. A has fulfilled the condition.
- (v) A legacy is bequeathed to A on condition that he shall marry with the consent of B, C and D. A marries without the consent of B, C and D, but obtains their consent after the marriage. A has not fulfilled the condition.
- (vi) A makes a will whereby he bequeaths a sum of money to B if B shall marry with the consent of A's executors. B marries during the lifetime of A, and A afterwards expresses his approbation of the marriage. A dies. The bequest to B takes effect.
- (vii) A legacy is bequeathed to A if he executed a certain document within a time specified in the will. The document is executed by A within a reasonable time, but not within the time specified in the will. A has not performed the condition, and is not entitled to receive the legacy.

Illustrations (ii) and (v) are the same as those in s 26 of the TP Act. Illust (vii), like illust (v) shows that if the condition is clear it is not to be evaded. In a case decided by the Privy Council, a legacy was bequeathed on condition that the legatee should 'humbly apply for subsistence'. However, as the legatee claimed as of right maintenance suitable to his rank and position, it was held that there was no substantial compliance with the condition and that the legacy failed.<sup>50</sup>

Conditional transfer to one person coupled with transfer to another on failure of prior disposition

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of one person, and by the same transaction an ulterior disposition of the same interest is made in favour of another, if the prior disposition under the transfer shall fail, the ulterior disposition shall take effect upon the failure of the prior disposition, although the failure may not have occurred in the manner contemplated by the transferor.

But, where the intention of the parties to the transaction is that the ulterior disposition shall take effect only in the event of the prior disposition failing in a particular manner, the ulterior disposition shall not take effect unless the prior disposition fails in that manner.

Illustrations

- (a) A transfers Rs 500 to B on condition that he shall execute a certain lease within three months after A's death, and, if he should neglect to do so, to C. B dies in A's life-time. The disposition in favour of C takes effect.
- (b) A transfers property to his wife; but, in case she should die in his life-time, transfers to B that which he had transferred to her. A and his wife perish together under circumstances which make it impossible to prove that she died before him. The disposition in favour of B does not take effect.

(1) Shall fail

These words are important for they indicate that the prior interest is valid, and fails subsequently by reason of the valid condition not being fulfilled. If the prior interest is invalid under s 13 or s 14, the subsequent interest fails also under s 16. If the prior interest is invalid under s 25, the subsequent interest fails also under that section or under the combined effect of s 25 and s 28. This has been explained and illustrated in note (3) under s 16.

(2) Acceleration

In other cases, ie, where the prior interest is valid and fails as the valid condition on which it rests has not been fulfilled,<sup>51</sup> this section is applicable. The law favouring the vesting of estates says that the subsequent interest takes effect as if the prior interest has never been in the way. This results in an acceleration of the subsequent interest. In Jull v Jacobs,<sup>52</sup> there was a bequest to A for life and then to his children. The gift to A failed as he had attested the will; but VC Malins held that the life estate being out of the way, the gift to the children took effect. This case was followed by the Privy Council in a case where there was a bequest to a wife for life, and then to her children.<sup>53</sup> The gift of the wife failed under a local Act for want of registration, but the effect was to accelerate the gift of the children. In Eavestaff v Austin,<sup>54</sup> Lord Romilly decided that the rule applied not only to reality, but to personality. The principle of the section was applied in the following case which occurred in Oudh.<sup>55</sup> In that case, the right to manage a Hindu religious endowment was declared by an award to be vested for successive periods of 21 years, first in D, then in R, then in S, then in D's eldest son, then in R's eldest son, and then in S's eldest son. R and S both died in the second period of 21 years which belonged to R. The court held that the turn of management of D's eldest son was accelerated.

The rule has been justified on the ground that it gives effect to the intention of the grantor. In Lainson v Lainson<sup>56</sup> Lord Romilly said--

Although the expression used was that the estate to the son of John Lainson is only to take effect from and after John Lainson's decease, I am of opinion that the meaning is "from and after the determination of his estate by death or otherwise". In deciding thus I fulfil the intention of the testator.

A failure of a prior gift does not accelerate a subsequent transfer not taking effect on the determination of the prior interest; thus a subsequent gift cannot be accelerated, where the persons who are to take under it are only ascertainable at a future date. It also cannot take effect unless two gifts are dependent on each other.<sup>57</sup>

(3) Exception

The second clause refers to the exceptional case where the intention has been expressed that the gift over shall not take the effect, unless the prior gift fails in the particular manner stated.

(4) Indian Succession Act

The rule of acceleration is enacted in s 129 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. Two illustrations are annexed, one of which is the same as illust (a) to s 27 of the TP Act, and the other is as follows:

A bequeaths a sum of money to his own children surviving him, and if they all die under 18, to B. A dies without having even had a child. The bequest to B takes effect.

The exception to the rule of acceleration is enacted in s 130 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The section has one illustration which is the same as illust (b) to s 27 of the TP Act. An instance of the exception is the case of Official Assignee of Madras v Thayarammal.<sup>58</sup> In that case, the testator wished to disinherit his son, and left his property to any grandson or grandsons who might be born in his lifetime or within ten years of his death, and 'if there shall be no such grandsons to be born as aforesaid' the whole estate to his granddaughters. A grandson was born within ten years of his death, but the gift to the grandson failed not only under the rule in the Tagore case, but also because the estate could not be left in suspense. The question then arose whether the gift having failed in a different manner from that contemplated, the granddaughters could take. It was held that they could not, because the testator's intention was that they should not take if there was a grandson in existence.

(5) Indian Cases

The following are some Indian instances of the rule:

- (1) The testator's wife was enceinte and the testator left his property to the expected son and made a provision for the maintenance of the daughter should the expected child prove to be a daughter. There was a gift over in case the son died before attaining majority. On the birth of a daughter, the court held that the gift over took effect, although the failure of the gift to the son not in the manner contemplated by the testator.<sup>59</sup>
- (2) The testator made a gift to a son to be adopted by his wife and, in case of his death without issue, to his daughters. The power of adoption to be invalid, but although the prior bequest failed the gift over to the daughters took effect.<sup>60</sup>
- (3) A made a bequest to a minor son, and on his death before attaining majority to the widow for life, and then to the daughters. It was held that the daughters were not deprived of this legacy by the death of the widow before the minor son.<sup>61</sup>

A case decided by Bombay High Court may perhaps be cited here, although it was not decided under the Indian Succession Act 1925. The bequest was to the widow Parwati for life, and on her death, to the daughter Saraswati's sons, but in case Saraswati had no sons, then to Saraswati for life, and on her death to the testator's cousin. Parwati died in April 1907 and Saraswati had a son born in December 1907. The son could not take under Hindu law as he was not in existence at the death of the testator. The court said that although the intention of the testator to give his property to his daughter's son's son was defeated, yet as his next intention was to keep the property in the family, the gift over to the cousin took effect.<sup>62</sup>

Ulterior transfer conditional on happening or not happening of Specified event

--On a transfer of property an interest therein may be created to accrue to any person with the condition superadded that in case a specified uncertain event shall happen such interest shall pass to another person, or that in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen such interest shall pass to another person. In each case the dispositions are subject to the rules contained in sections 10, 12, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 and 27.

(1) Conditional Limitation

The ulterior transfer, as it is called in the marginal note to this section, or ulterior disposition, as it is called in ss 27, 29 and 30, is effected by a conditional limitation. A conditional limitation, is one containing a condition which divests an estate that has vested and vests it in another person. As regards the prior interest, it is a condition subsequent, but as regards the ulterior interest, it is a condition precedent.

Illustrations

- (1) A settled property on his second wife for her life, and then on her son if she should have a son; but if she should not have a son, then on the sons by his first wife. The Privy Council held that the sons by the first wife took a vested interest liable to be divested by the birth of a son to the second wife.<sup>63</sup>
- (2) The terms of a compromise provided that L should have an estate for life, and after her death, R should be full owner if he survived L, and if he did not, the estate would pass to R's, lineal male descendant according to the rule of primogenitur. The court held that the condition affected the retention of the estate and not in acquisition, and construed the compromise as conferring on R a vested interest liable to be divested if he did not survive L.<sup>64</sup>

(2) Specified Sections

The ulterior transfer or conditional limitation, is subject to the rules contained in the sections specified in this section. The application of these sections is best explained by following illustrations:

- s 10-- A transfers his field to B without power of alienation and in case of B's death without issue, to C also without power of alienation. The restriction is void in both cases.
- s 12-- A transfers his field to B, and if B becomes insolvent, to C. B becomes insolvent. The field vests not in C but in the Official Receiver of the Official Assignee as the case may be.
- s 21-- A transfers his field to B, and in case of B's death without issue, to C. C has a contingent interest which becomes vested on B's death without issue.
- s 22-- A transfers his field to B and on B's death to such of the children of C as shall attain the age of 18. All the children of C who are alive at B's death have an interest, which vests when they attain the age of 18.
- s 23-- A transfers his field to B for life and then to C, if C goes to England. C does not go to England until a year after B's death. C's interest fails.

- s 24-- A transfers his field to B and on B's death without issue to the sons of C or the survivor of them. The sons of C who survive B take the field.
- s 25-- A transfers his field to B on condition that he murders C with a proviso that on B's death without issue the field shall belong to D. The interest both of B and of D fails.

(3) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 131. The following illustrations are annexed to the section:

- (i) A sum of money is bequeathed to A, to be paid to him at the age of 18 and if he shall die before he attains that age, to B. A takes a vested interest in the legacy, subject to be divested and to go to B in case A dies under 18.
- (ii) An estate is bequeathed to A with the proviso that if A shall dispute the competency of the testator to make a will, the estate shall go to B. A disputes the competency of the testator to make a will. The estate goes to B.
- (iii) A sum of money is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B but if B shall then be dead, leaving a son, such son is to stand in the place of B. B takes a vested interest in the legacy, subject to be divested if he dies leaving a son in A's life-time.
- (iv) A sum of money is bequeathed to A and B, and if either should die during the life of C, then to the survivor living at the death of C. A and B die before C. The gift over cannot take effect, but the representative of A takes one-half of the money, and the representative of B takes the other half.
- (v) A bequeaths to B the interest of a fund for life, and directs the fund to be divided at her death equally among her three children, or such of them as shall be living at her death. All the children of B die in B's lifetime. The bequest over cannot take effect, but the interests of the children pass to their representatives.

In the reported cases, divesting conditions in wills have generally been on account of death without issue,<sup>65</sup> or non-residence.<sup>66</sup> In Gooroo Das v Sarat Chunder<sup>67</sup> there was a gift for life to the widow and then an absolute estate of inheritance to the brothers liable to be divested, if the widow adopted a son; it was held to be a valid conditional limitation.

In Bachman v Bachman,<sup>68</sup> the testator directed his trustees and executors to sell his estate and divide the proceeds between the legatees in certain proportions, but that if any legatee should die in his lifetime or before the division leaving lawful issue, such issue should be entitled to the share his deceased parent would have taken. One legatee died five months after the testator, but before the division had been made, leaving lawful issue. The court held that this legatee took a vested interest which was divested by his death before the division and the gift over to the legatee's issue took effect. The court followed the decision in Johnson v Crook.<sup>69</sup> However, the authority of Johnson's case is very doubtful, for the House of Lords in Minors v Battison<sup>70</sup> seem to have held that a divesting condition which depends upon the dilatoriness or caprice of a trustee, is void.<sup>71</sup>

In a Madras case,<sup>72</sup> there was a curious proviso which was held not to operate as a condition of defeasance. The bequest was to a daughter for life and then to her children, and if the daughter should die 'leaving no child living at her death' such property 'as shall not have become vested' was to go to the testator's son. The daughter had only one child, a son who predeceased her. The son's interest was vested, but it was not divested because the condition subsequent did not on the terms of the will apply to an interest which was vested.

(4) Repugnancy

A conditional limitation is a condition of defeasance, which terminates the interest of one person and invests another person with it. However, if an estate is given to a named donee in terms which confer an absolute estate, and then a further interest is given merely after or on termination of that donee's interest, and not in defeasance of it; the further interest will be void for repugnancy. Thus, when a testator gave an absolute estate to his wife with power of alienation, and then added a clause that 'if, at the time of the death of my widow, there be no adopted son or if no son or wife of the adopted son be alive, then, my heir according to the Hindu shastras who shall be alive at the time shall get the properties which shall remain after disposal by my wife by way of gift or sale of the same': -- the gift over was invalid.<sup>73</sup> Similarly, in Anandrao Vinayak v Administrator General of Bombay,<sup>74</sup> the testator made an absolute gift to his son G, and then added 'and when the sons of my son G shall attain the age of twenty-one years, the same shall be divided and duly received by G and his sons in equal shares.' The gift to the grandsons was void for repugnancy, and the absolute estate of G was not divested. In a Bombay case,<sup>75</sup> however, where the testator gave an absolute estate to R and then added 'should R die and should he then leave a son, such his son shall afterwards be the owner'-- it was held that R took only a life-estate.

(5) Hindu Law

The section applies to Hindus, and conditional limitations or grants subject to defeasance with a gift over have always been recognized in Hindu law.

(6) Mahomedan Law

A gift cannot be made so as to take effect on the happening of a contingency. It follows that, conditional limitations are not recognized in Mahomedan law.

Fulfilment of condition subsequent

--An ulterior disposition of the kind contemplated by the last preceding section cannot, take effect unless the condition is strictly fulfilled.

Illustration

A transfers Rs 500 to B, to be paid to him on his attaining his majority or marrying, with a proviso that, if B dies as minor or marries without C's consent, the Rs 500 shall go to D. B marries when only 17 years of age, without C's consent. The transfer of D takes effect.

(1) Performance of a Condition Subsequent

It follows from the principle that the law favours the vesting of estates, that a condition subsequent, which has the effect of divesting an estate is subject to the rule of strict construction, and that a condition precedent to an estate vesting is deemed to have been fulfilled, if it is substantially complied with. This has been explained in note (1) under s 26 where illust (a) to s 26 has been contrasted with illust (i) to s 132 of the Indian Succession Act 1925.

If the interest has become vested, it is not to be taken away except by clear words.<sup>76</sup> In a case where a Hindu widow was authorised to adopt a son, with a direction that if the first adopted son died before the age of 20, she was to adopt another son to take the place of the deceased adopted son, the Calcutta High Court said that a clause of defeasance in order to be operative, must contain express words or words necessary implication of a gift over to a definite person or persons.<sup>77</sup> The implication of a gift over to the second adopted son was not sufficient to prevent the widow of the first adopted son from inheriting her husband's share.<sup>78</sup>

Where the words of the condition are clear, they must be clearly fulfilled. If there is any ambiguity in the condition subsequent, it will be read in the sense most favourable to the vested interest. Accordingly, a gift to A for life and then to his children with a gift over in the event of A's death without leaving children, is construed as a gift over in the event of A's death without having had a child.<sup>79</sup>

Ignorance of a condition is no excuse for non-compliance,<sup>80</sup> for a person who takes under an instrument cannot plead want of knowledge of its contents.<sup>81</sup> Similarly, a condition violated under duress will not forfeit the bequest, and a condition requiring residence in a holy place is not broken when the devisee was forcibly removed to another place.<sup>82</sup>

(2) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act 1925, is s 132. The third illustration to that section is the same as that to s 29 of the TP Act.

The other illustrations are as follows:

- (i) A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, C and D, the legacy will go to E. D dies. Even if A marries without the consent of B and C, the gift to E does not take effect.
- (ii) A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, the legacy shall go to C. A marries with the consent of B. He afterwards becomes a widower and marries again without the consent of B. The bequest to C does not take effect.

Illustration (i) imports the same condition as illust (a) to s 26 of the TP Act, or illust (ii) to s 128 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, but as it is here a condition subsequent, it is subject to strict construction, and is discharged by the death of one of the parties whose consent is required. In the second illustration, the condition once fulfilled is discharged.

Prior disposition not affected by invalidity of ulterior disposition

--If the ulterior disposition is not valid, the prior disposition is not affected by it.

Illustration

A transfers a farm to B for her life, and, if she does not desert her husband to C. B is entitled to the farm during her life as if no condition had been inserted.

(1) Subsequent Interest Invalid

When a prior interest is invalid either as offending against the rule against perpetuity, or as being illegal or impossible under s 25, the subsequent interest also fails. This has been explained in the note (2) under s 16. However, if the subsequent interest is invalid, then the prior interest is not affected.

Illustrations

- (1) A transfers his field to B with a proviso that on the death of B's last lineal male descendant the field shall belong to the lineal descendant of C. The ulterior disposition to C is invalid under the rule against perpetuity, but the estate of B is not affected.
- (2) A transfers his field to B with a proviso that if R does not within a year set fire to C's haystack, the field shall belong to D. The ulterior disposition to D is invalid under s 25, but the interest of B is not affected.

In Saraju Bala v Jyotirmoyee,<sup>83</sup> there was a gift of an absolute estate to a daughter, with a defeasance clause whereby the property was to revert to the heirs of the grantor in case of the failure of her descendants. The Privy Council held that as the defeasance clause was void, the daughter was entitled to dispose of the property by will. In Beard IN RE. , Reversionary & General Securities Ltd v Hall,<sup>84</sup> there was a devise with a condition of defeasance in case the devisee entered the naval or military forces of the Crown, but as the condition was void as opposed to public policy, the devisee took an absolute interest.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The same rule is enacted in s 133 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. Three illustrations are annexed to the section of which the second is the same as that in this section. The other two illustrations are as follows:

- (i) An estate is bequeathed to A for his life with condition superadded that, if he shall not on a given day walk 100 miles in an hour, the estate shall go to B. The condition being void. A retains his estate as if no condition had been inserted in the will.
- (ii) An estate is bequeathed to A for life, and, if he marries, to the eldest son of B for life. B, at the date of the testator's death, had not had a son. The bequest over is void under s 105, and A is entitled to the estate during his life.

In Bai Dhanlaxmi v Hari Prasad,<sup>85</sup> there was an absolute bequest to the eldest son with a superadded condition of defeasance in case of failure of male issue, and an attempt to create an estate of inheritance not known to Hindu law. The court held that the original bequest to the son was not affected by the failure of the gift over. In Narsingh Rao v Mahalakshmi,<sup>86</sup> the settlor, whose son was in prison, made a gift in 1875 of his property to his widow with a condition of defeasance in case his son should have a son within 16 years, in which case the property was to go to the grandson. The condition was void under Hindu law as it then was, being in favour of an unborn person, and the widow took an absolute and indefeasible estate. The Privy Council said that:

it is a well settled principle of law, which has now been embodied in ss 28 and 30 of the Transfer of Property Act 1882, that in such a case if the ulterior disposition is not valid, the prior disposition is not affected by it.

(3) Hindu Law

The section now applies to Hindus, and the section of the Indian Succession Act 1925 applies to wills governed by the Hindu Wills Act. However, the principle of the sections has always been applied to Hindus. Thus, in Tagore v Tagore,<sup>87</sup> where there was a gift to A for life, and after him to his heirs in tail male, the subsequent disposition was invalid, but A's life-estate was not affected. Similarly, in Khetter Mohan Mullick v Gunga Narain,<sup>88</sup> it was held that specific trusts of specific estates good in themselves were not invalidated by a subsequent illegal disposition of the remainder. The case of Saraju Bala v Jyotirmoyee,<sup>89</sup> referred to in note (1) was decided under Hindu law.

Condition that transfer shall cease to have effect in case specified uncertain event happens or does not happen

--Subject to the provisions of section 12, on a transfer of property an interest therein may be created with the condition superadded that it shall cease to exist in case a specified uncertain event shall happen, or in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen.

Illustrations

- (a) A transfers a farm to B for his life, with a proviso that, in case B cuts down a certain wood, the transfer shall cease to have any effect. B cuts down the wood. He loses his life-interest in the farm.
- (b) A transfers a farm to B, provided that, if B shall not go to England within three years after the date of the transfer, his interest in the farm shall cease. B does not go to England within the term prescribed. His interest in the farm ceases.

(1) Condition Subsequent

The condition referred to in this section is a condition subsequent which terminates an interest and revests it in the grantor. It is not a conditional limitation, which creates an interest in a third person. The next section requires that the condition subsequent should be valid, otherwise it will not have the effect of terminating the interest to which it is attached. As the section is subject to s 12, it follows that a condition subsequent divesting an estate on the ground of insolvency or of attempted alienation would be void.

Illustrations

- (1) A is under sentence of transportation for life and transfers his field to B with a proviso that in case he returns from Port Blair, B's interest shall cease. A returns from Port Blair. B's interest in the field ceases: Venkatarama v Aiyasami 1922) 43 Mad LJ 340, 69 IC 673, AIR 1923 Mad 67.
- (2) A transfers his field to B with proviso that if B becomes insolvent, B's interest in the field shall cease. B is adjudged insolvent. The field vests in the Official Receiver or the Official Assignee as the case may be.

A condition subsequent requiring residence in a particular house has been held to be valid.<sup>90</sup> A condition requiring residence in a holy place was not broken when the devisee was forcibly detained in another place.<sup>91</sup> A gift which is revocable under s 126 is an instance of a transfer subject to a condition subsequent.<sup>92</sup>

This section applies only to a completed transfer of property creating an interest therein with a condition superadded for its cessor on a certain contingency, but has no application to a contract for transfer with a condition superadded thereto. Thus, where in a sale deed it was provided that if the vendee did not pay the amount of the price retained by him to the creditor of the vendor within a certain time, the sale deed would be deemed to have been cancelled, and the vendee failed to pay the price to the creditor within time and the court gave him further time to pay, it was held that the contract of sale and the act of transfer were embodied in the same deed, and the condition was to be regarded as an integral condition of the contract for sale providing the date for completion of the contract by satisfaction of the balance of the contract price, and not as a condition superadded to the transfer itself, and, therefore, the transfer was not defeated. It was held that there was nothing in s 31, which merely declared that a limitation upon a condition subsequent is a lawful method of grant, to exclude the right of the court to give relief to the vendee who failed to make payment of the price by the date agreed upon in the contract of sale.<sup>93</sup>

In a case before the Orissa High Court,<sup>94</sup> the court was considering a lease to the defendants for the manufacture of salt which provided, inter alia, that the lease stood cancelled if the lessee did 'any other business or manufacture of any other kind' on the land. The lessee used the lands for fishing, and the lessor purported to cancel the lease. The court held, relying on the illustrations to s 31, that:

a specified event contemplated under s 31 must be definite and specific and a wide and vague clause of the nature of 'any other business' cannot be taken to be a specified event.... We may be inclined to agree if the condition was of the nature that if the lessee carry on business in fish or business in timber, it may come within the operation of the provisions of s 31. But the provisions of the lease being to the effect that if the lessees carry on any other business or manufacture, it cannot be taken to be a specified event.<sup>95</sup>

Sed quaere, for the section does not prescribe a specific event, but merely specified events, ie, the section requires that the uncertain event should be definitely and fully set out. In any event, it is difficult to see how the wide, but definite negative concept 'any other business' is less specific than the positive examples mentioned.

(2) Condition Subsequent a Penalty

It has been held that if a condition subsequent involving forfeiture of an estate is in the nature of a penalty, it may be relieved against, and pecuniary compensation may be awarded for non-performance.<sup>96</sup>

(3) Indian Succession Act 1925

This section corresponds to s 134 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. Five illustrations are annexed to the section in the Indian Succession Act 1925, of which the first and third are the same as those in this section. The others are:

- (ii) An estate is bequeathed to A, provided that, if he marries under the age of 25 without the consent of the executors named in the will, the estate shall cease to belong to him. A marries under 25 without the consent of the executors. The estate ceases to belong to him.
- (iv) An estate is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if she becomes a nun, she shall cease to have any interest in the estate. A becomes a nun. She loses her interest under the will.
- (v) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, after his death, to B, if B shall then be living, with a proviso that, if B shall become a nun, the bequest to her shall cease to have any effect. B becomes a nun in the life-time of A. She thereby loses her contingent interest in the fund.

Such condition must not be invalid

--In order that a condition that an interest shall cease to exist may be valid, it is necessary that the event to which it relates be one which could legally constitute the condition of the creation of an interest.

(1) Invalid Condition

If the condition is invalid, it cannot be set up as a condition precedent for crystallisation of the interest created.<sup>97</sup> This section is analogous to s 30. Under s 30, an invalid ulterior disposition will not affect a prior interest; and so under this section, an invalid condition subsequent will not divest the interest to which it is attached. A condition which is void as a condition precedent is also void as a condition subsequent.

Illustration

A transfers his field to B with a proviso that if B does not within a year set fire to C's haystack his interest shall cease. The condition subsequent is invalid and B's interest is not affected.

Instances of conditions subsequently void as contrary to public policy, are a condition divesting the interest of a devisee if he enters the naval or military forces of his country,<sup>98</sup> or a condition requiring the donee to obtain a title.<sup>99</sup> A condition that a person shall not become a Christian is valid.<sup>1</sup>

(2) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act is s 135 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. If the condition is invalid, failure to comply with it does not involve forfeiture. Where a testator bequeathed an annuity to his wife which would, according to the terms of the will, be forfeited if she did not live in the family house which he intended to build, but died without building, the condition was void for impossibility and the widow was held to be entitled to the annuity, although she lived in her father's house.<sup>2</sup>

33. Transfer conditional on performance of act, no time being specified for performance

--Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created subject to a condition that the person taking it shall perform a certain act, but no time is specified for the performance of the act, the condition is broken when he renders impossible, permanently or for an indefinite period, the performance of the act.

(1) Time for Performance

When no time is fixed for the performance of a condition subsequent, it is broken not only when the person does an act which renders performance impossible, but also when he does an act by which performance is indefinitely postponed. This is explained by the second illustration to s 136 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, set out in the next paragraph.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The corresponding provision is s 136 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The following illustrations are annexed to the section:

- (i) A bequest is made to A, with a proviso that, unless he enters the Army, the legacy shall go over to B. A takes Holy Orders, and thereby renders it impossible that he should fulfil the condition. B is entitled to receive the legacy.
- (ii) A bequest is made to A, with a proviso that it shall cease to have any effect if he does not marry B's daughter. A marries a stranger and thereby indefinitely postpones the fulfilment of the conditions. The bequest ceases to have effect.

The second illustration corresponds to the illust to s 34 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.

A testator bequeathed his property to his daughter's son, in the event of his widow dying without adopting a son, but the interest was conditional on the daughter's son residing in the family house. The daughter's son joined the widow in selling the house. This was a breach of the condition, and he was deprived of the interest given by the will.<sup>3</sup>

Transfer conditional on performance of act, time being specified

--Where an act is to be performed by a person either as a condition to be fulfilled before an interest created on a transfer of property is enjoyed by him, or as a condition on the non-fulfilment of which the interest is to pass from him to another person, and a time is specified for the performance of the act, if such performance within the specified time is prevented by the fraud of a person who would be directly benefited by non-fulfilment of the condition, such further time shall as against him be allowed for performing the act as shall be requisite to make up for the delay caused by such fraud. But if no time is specified for the performance of the act, then, if its performance is by the fraud of a person interested in the non-fulfilment of the condition rendered impossible or in-definitely postponed, the condition shall as against him be deemed to have been fulfilled.

(1) Principle

The principle underlying this section is that no party can take advantage of his own fraud. If performance of a condition, whether subsequent or precedent, is prevented by a person interested in its non-fulfilment, the delay is excused, and the condition is discharged.

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The corresponding section is s 137 of the Indian Succession Act 1925.

In a case decided by Calcutta High Court,<sup>4</sup> the testator directed that if any of the female members of his family lived for more than three months at any place other than a holy place, they would forfeit their interest under his will. The forfeiture was not incurred when they were forcibly removed by their relations.

35. Election when necessary

--Where a person professes to transfer property which he has no right to transfer, and as part of the same transaction confers any benefit on the owner of the property, such owner must elect either to confirm such transfer or to dissent from it; and in the latter case he shall relinquish the benefit so conferred, and the benefit so relinquished shall revert to the transferor or his representative as if it had not been disposed of, subject nevertheless, where the transfer is gratuitous, and the transferor has, before the election, died or otherwise become incapable of making a fresh transfer, and in all cases where the transfer is for consideration, to the charge of making good to the disappointed transferee the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him.

Illustrations

The farm of Sultanpur is the property of C and worth Rs 800. A by an instrument of gift professes to transfer it to B, giving by the same instrument Rs 1,000 to C. C elects to retain the farm. He forfeits the gift of Rs 1,000.

In the same case, A dies before the election. His representative must out of the Rs 1,000 pay Rs 800 to B.

The rule in the first paragraph of this section applies whether the transferor does or does not believe that which he professes the transfer to be his own.

A person taking no benefit directly under a transaction, but deriving a benefit under it indirectly, need not elect.

A person who in one capacity takes a benefit under the transaction may in another dissent therefrom.

Exception to the last preceding four rules. -Where a particular benefit is expressed to be conferred on the owner of the property which the transferor professes to transfer, and such benefit is expressed to be in lieu of that property, if such owner claims the property, he must relinquish the particular benefit, but he is not bound to relinquish any other benefit conferred upon him by the same transaction.

Acceptance of the benefit by the person on whom it is conferred constitutes an election by him to confirm the transfer, if he is aware of his duty to elect and of those circumstances which would influence the judgment of a reasonable man in making an election, or if he waives inquiry into the circumstances.

Such knowledge or waiver shall, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed, if the person on whom the benefit has been conferred has enjoyed it for two years without doing any act to express dissent.

Such knowledge or waiver may be inferred from any act of his which renders it impossible to place the persons interested in the property professed to be transferred in the same condition as if such act had not been done.

A transfers to B an estate to which C is entitled, and as part of the same transaction gives C a coal -mine. C takes possession of the mine and exhausts it. He has thereby confirmed the transfer of the estate to B.

If he does not within one year after the date of the transfer signify to the transferor or his representatives his intention to confirm or to dissent from the transfer, the transferor or his representatives may, upon the expiration of that period, require him to make his election; and if he does not comply with such requisition within a reasonable time after he has received it, he shall be deemed to have elected to confirm the transfer.

In case of disability, the election shall be postponed until the disability ceases, or until the election is made by some competent authority.

(1) Election

The foundation of the doctrine of election is that a person taking the benefit of an instrument must also bear the burden,<sup>5</sup> and that he cannot take under and against the same instrument.<sup>6</sup> It is, therefore, a branch of the general rule that no one may approbate and reprobate.<sup>7</sup> However, there must be a will or a deed which conveys title to a person in properties other than those belonging to himself before he can be put to election. A surrender by a Hindu widow to her immediate reversioner does not amount to such conveyance, for on a surrender taking place the widow, by a legal fiction is assumed as dead and the reversioner takes the estate as the heir of the last full owner, and not as a transferee from the widow.<sup>8</sup>

The doctrine is based on intention to this extent that the law presumes that the author of an instrument intended to give effect to every part of it.<sup>9</sup>

(2) Indian Succession Act 1925

The rule of election as applied to wills is enacted in ss 180 to 190 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The following illustrations under s 182 are instances of election:

- (i) The farm of Sultanpur was the property of C. A bequeathed it to B, giving a legacy of 1,000 rupees to C. C has elected to retain his farm of Sultanpur, which is worth 800 rupees. C forfeits his legacy of 1,000 rupees, of which 800 rupees goes to B, and the remaining 200 rupees falls into the residuary bequest, or devolves according to the rules of intestate succession, as the case may be.
- (ii) A bequeaths an estate to B in case B's elder brother (who is married and has children) shall leave no issue living at his death. A also bequeaths to C a jewel, which belongs to B. B must elect to give up the jewel or to lose the estate.
- (iii) A bequeaths to B 1,000 rupees, and to C an estate which will, under a settlement, belong to B if his elder brother (who is married and has children) shall leave no issue living at his death. B must elect to give up the estate or to lose the legacy.
- (iv) A, a person of the age of 18, domiciled in British India but owning real property in England, to which C is heir at law, bequeaths a legacy to C and, subject thereto, devises and bequeaths to B 'all my property whatsoever and wheresoever,' and dies under 21. The real property in England does not pass by the will. C may claim his legacy without giving up the real property in England.

The first illustration is almost identical with a Madras case,<sup>10</sup> in which the testator bequeathed a field which belonged to his niece, to his grandson, and at the same time left his niece a legacy of Rs 800. The court held that she must elect between the land or the legacy. The second and third illustrations show that the principle applies to all interests whether vested or contingent, immediate or remote.<sup>11</sup>

(3) Proprietary Interest

A person is not put to his election, unless he has a proprietary interest in the property disposed of in derogation of his rights.<sup>12</sup> A creditor is not put to his election, for he has only a personal claim for payment by his debtor.<sup>13</sup> A bequest in the will of a Hindu that 'my elder brother V's self-acquisition to the extent of Rs 10,000 is with me, so, that money should be given to him' was treated as a legacy in satisfaction of the debt, and V was not estopped from claiming it by the fact that he had tried and failed to recover the money as a debt.<sup>14</sup> In another case, the testator disposed of his property in favour of his wife and daughter, and then gave away 'my own and my wife's ornaments,' but the court held that this did not raise a question of election as the stridhan ornaments in which his wife had a proprietary interest were not included in the bequest.<sup>15</sup> If the property which the testator professes to dispose of does not belong to the other legatee, no question of election can of course, arise.<sup>16</sup>

(4) Same Transaction

The equity of election does not apply, unless the two donations are part of the same transaction, for if the two are independent, the one which is in the power of the transferor will stand, while the other will fail. In Muhammad Afzal v Ghulam Kasim,<sup>17</sup> government on the death of the Nawab of Tank, when transferring the chiefship to the eldest son, transferred a portion of the cash allowance of the late Nawab to the second son on whom the late Nawab had already made a grant of two villages for maintenance. The Privy Council said that the second son was not put to his election, as the two grants came from independent sources. In another case, a Hindu widow made a gift in excess of her powers and subsequently left a will in the following terms: 'Excluding the properties which I have already given away, I will make the following dispositions.' The Madras High Court held that the plaintiff taking under the will was not precluded by the doctrine of election from disputing the prior gift which was not the subject of the will at all.<sup>18</sup>

Election may arise when the two donations are conferred by two different instruments, if the two instruments are used to carry out one transaction.<sup>19</sup>

(5) Benefit

The doctrine can only apply if a benefit in the real sense is conferred by the instrument. Where by a will the testator purports to bequeath to his coparcener joint family property, such coparcener who would in any case have been entitled to such property, cannot be said to have derived any benefit under the will, and is not put to election.<sup>20</sup>

(6) Doctrine of Election not Available to Cure an Illegality

The doctrine of election cannot be resorted to in order to cure an illegality, and a gift which infringes the rule against perpetuities cannot be used to raise a case for election. A purported release by a Muslim daughter, which was void under s 6(a), cannot be saved by the doctrine of election, for that would amount to curing a manifest illegality.<sup>21</sup> Illust (iv) to s 182 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, cited in note 2 above, appears to be based on the supposition that a devise by an infant would in English law be a breach of the law, but it may be doubted whether in English law it would be considered as more than a case of incapacity to dispose of the land, in which case the heir would be put to his election. Not only will the doctrine of election not cure an illegality, but as election is a doctrine of equity it will not be applied so as to lead to inequitable results.<sup>22</sup>

(7) Revert to the Transferor

The doctrine in India rests on forfeiture, and the disappointed donee looks to the transferor to compensate him by a charge on the property that has reverted to him. There is no occasion for a charge if the transferor survives and the transfer is gratuitous, for it is open to the transferor to make a substituted gift.

(8) Belief of the Transferor

The second para corresponds to s 182 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. As already stated, the principle may refer to the implied intention of the testator, but it is not necessary that he should have had in mind the equitable principle of election.<sup>23</sup> It does not matter whether the transferor thought he had the power to convey, or knowing the extent of his authority, intended by an arbitrary execution of power to exceed it.<sup>24</sup> To quote the words of Lord Alvanley 'nothing can be more dangerous than to speculate upon what he would have done, if he had known one thing or another'.<sup>25</sup> It is not, therefore, necessary that the author of the instrument should have known that the property did not belong to him or that he intended to put the donee to an election. However, this intention may be expressed, and then the condition is a condition precedent which must be literally performed. This is the case in the exception discussed in note (11) below.

(9) Indirect Benefit

The third para corresponds to s 184 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 (s 171, Indian Succession Act 1865).

The section is explained by the following illustration:

The lands of Sultanpur are settled upon C for life, and after his death upon D, his only child. A bequeaths the lands of Sultanpur to B, and 1,000 rupees to C. C dies intestate shortly after the testator, and without having made any election. D takes out administration to C, and as administrator elects on behalf of C's estate to take under the will. In that capacity he receives the legacy of 1,000 rupees and accounts to B for the rents of the lands of Sultanpur which accrued after the death of the testator and before the death of C. In his individual character he retains the lands of Sultanpur in opposition to the will.

On the same principle, it has been held in England that a man may be tenant by courtesy of an estate tail held by his wife in opposition to a will under which he accepts a legacy.<sup>26</sup> The interest which the husband takes in such a case is an incident of the property of his wife, and not a benefit conferred by the transferor so as to raise a case for election.

(10) Different Capacity

The fourth para corresponds with the first part of s 185 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, which is explained by the following illustration:

The estate of Sultanpur is settled upon A for life, and after his death, upon B. A leaves the estate of Sultanpur to D, and 2,000 rupees to B, and 1,000 rupees to C, who is B's only child. B dies intestate, shortly after the testator, without having made an election. C takes out administration to B, and as administrator elects to keep the estate of Sultanpur in opposition to the will, and to relinquish the legacy of 2,000 rupees. C may do this, and yet claim the legacy of 1,000 rupees under the will.

An administrator or trustee may take a benefit qua administrator for the benefit of the estate, or of the beneficiary, and take a benefit for himself without being put to an election. No question of election can arise merely because owing to circumstances two capacities have merged in one person.<sup>27</sup>

(11) Exception

The exception corresponds to the second part of s 186 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, where it is explained by the following illustration:

Under A's marriage settlement, his wife is entitled, if she survives him, to the enjoyment of the estate of Sultanpur during her life. A, by his will bequeaths to his wife an annuity of 200 rupees during her life, in lieu other interest in the estate of Sultanpur, which estate he bequeaths to his son. He also gives his wife a legacy of 1,000 rupees. The widow elects to take what she is entitled to under the settlement. She is bound to relinquish the annuity but not the legacy of 1,000 rupees.

Section 172 of the Indian Succession Act 1865, (corresponding to s 186 of the 1925 Act) was referred to in a Calcutta case,<sup>28</sup> in which a testator bequeathed to his nephew all his property including the share of his brother's widow, and made a provision for the widow's maintenance. The widow recovered the maintenance allowance by suit, and it was held that a subsequent suit for her share of the property was barred by s 172, as she must have known that the allowance was given to her in lieu of other share of the property. It is submitted, however, that the case did not fall under s 172 as the allowance was not expressed to be in lieu of her share, and that the only issue was whether the first suit constituted a valid and final election to confirm the bequest.

(12) Acceptance

The fifth para corresponds to s 187 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, which is explained by the following illustrations:

- (i) A is the owner of an estate called Sultanpur Khurd, and has a life interest in another estate called Sultanpur Buzurg to which upon his death his son B will be absolutely entitled. The will of A gives the estate of Sultanpur Khurd to B, and the estate of Sultanpur Buzurg to C. B, in ignorance of his own right to the estate of Sultanpur Buzurg, allows C to take possession of it, and enters into possession of the estate of Sultanpur Khurd. B has not confirmed the bequest of Sultanpur Buzurg to C.
- (ii) B, the eldest son of A, is the possessor of an estate called Sultanpur, A bequeaths Sultanpur to C, and to B the residue of A's property. B having been informed by A's executors that the residue will amount to 5,000 rupees, allows C to take possession of Sultanpur. He afterwards discovers that the residue does not amount to more than 500 rupees. B has not confirmed the bequest of the estate of Sultanpur to C.

Acceptance of a benefit implies an election,<sup>29</sup> but as in English law, there is no implied election except by a party who has full knowledge of the circumstances that would influence the judgment of a reasonable man making the election, and with that knowledge determines to elect.<sup>30</sup> He waives the inquiry into the circumstances if he wilfully abstains from inquiring into them so that he is affected with constructive notice of them. An election made with full knowledge is final;<sup>31</sup> but an election made without such knowledge may be revoked by the representatives of the electing party.<sup>32</sup> Cases have arisen in India in connection with bequests to pardanashin women, and it has been held that it must be proved that they were fully aware of their rights when the acts were done which are said to constitute an election.<sup>33</sup> In Sadik Husain v Hashim Ali,<sup>34</sup> a Mahomedan executed a voluntary trust deed settling property on his wife in satisfaction of her claim for dower, and the Privy Council observed that 'if she was never fully informed of its purport and contents, any election by her to accept the provision made for herself and her children by it in discharge of the unpaid balance of her dower would, of course, be of no avail.'

(13) Two Years' Enjoyment

The sixth para corresponds to s 188(1) of the Indian Succession Act 1925. The presumption may be rebutted. A widow who enjoyed a provision made for her under a will in ignorance of her right of dower was held entitled to elect after a lapse of 16 years.<sup>35</sup> When the person who has to elect is in possession of both estates, no presumption can be drawn.<sup>36</sup>

(14) Status quo cannot be restored

The seventh para corresponds with s 188(2) of the Indian Succession Act 1925. It is sufficiently explained by the illustration to the exception. The section permits an inference of knowledge which may be rebutted by circumstances.

(15) Time for election

The eighth para corresponds with s 189 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. If a time is fixed by the instrument, and the party makes default, he is deemed to have elected against the instrument.<sup>37</sup>

(16) Disability

The ninth para corresponds with s 190 of the Indian Succession Act 1925. A minor's election may be postponed until his majority, or his guardian may elect for him.

(17) Ratification

Cases of ratification must be distinguished from cases of election. For, ratification properly speaking, refers to acts done on behalf of the ratifier. If done without authority, the principal may elect either to ratify, or to disown them. This has been laid down in s 196 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. The doctrine of ratification rests, however, on the same principle that a man cannot both affirm and disaffirm the same transaction. Thus, when a widow who had a life-estate for maintenance granted a permanent lease, the reversioner could elect either to ratify it, or to set it aside; and it was held that he was not bound by the lease when he accepted rent for three years in ignorance of the circumstances under which the lease was granted or the terms on which it was held.<sup>38</sup> A converse case is Modhu Sudan v Rooke<sup>39</sup> where the reversioner accepted rent with full knowledge that the widow had granted a patni lease, and he was held to have elected to ratify the lease.

(18) Hindu Law

The section now applies to Hindus, but the principle has always applied. In Rungama v Atchama,<sup>40</sup> the Privy Council referred to the 'principle not peculiar to English law, but common to all law which is based on the rules of justice, viz, the principle that a party shall not at the same time affirm and disaffirm the same transaction-affirm it as far as it is for his benefit and disaffirm it as far as it is to his prejudice.'

In Shah Mukhun Lal v Sree Kishen Singh,<sup>41</sup> the Privy Council said that the principle that you cannot both approbate and reprobate the same transaction was a 'maxim founded, not so much on any positive law, as on the broad and universally applicable principles of justice.' The doctrine was directly applied in the case of Mangaldas v Runchhoddas.<sup>42</sup> A Hindu widow devised to K immovable property of her husband and gave the plaintiff, a reversionary heir, a legacy of Rs 2000. The plaintiff claimed the legacy under the will and the immovable property as heir. The court said that the doctrine of election applied, and that he must elect to take the one or the other.

(19) Mahomedan Law

The doctrine of election was applied to Mahomedans by the Privy Council in the case of Sadik Husain v Hashim Ali.<sup>43</sup>

Apportionment of periodical payments on determination of interest of person entitled

--In the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, all rents, annuities, pensions, dividends and other periodical payments in the nature of income shall, upon the transfer of the interest of the person entitled to receive such payments, be deemed, as between the transferor and the transferee, to accrue due from day to day, and to be apportionable accordingly, but to be payable on the days appointed for the payment thereof.

(1) Apportionment by Time

This section refers to apportionment by time, while the whole of s 37 refers to apportionment by estate.

Illustrations

- (1) A has let his house at a rent of Rs 100 payable on the last day of each month. A sells the house to B on 15 June. On 30 June, A is entitled to Rs 50 rent from the 1st to 15th and B is entitled to Rs 50 rent from 15th to 30th June. This is apportionment by time.
- (2) A has let his house at a rent of Rs 100. A sells half the house to B. The tenant having notice of the sale must pay from the date of the sale, rent at the rate of Rs 50 to A and Rs 50 to B. This is apportionment by estate.

On a transfer of property yielding income, s 8 provides that the transferee is entitled to the interest or income accruing after the transfer takes effect. The interest has in such cases to be divided between the transferor and the transferee. There is no difficulty in respect of interest, for that accrues from day to day. But as to income which does not accrue de die in diem, the rule in s 8 might lead to anomalous results. For instance, rents do not accrue from day to day, but at stated periods,<sup>44</sup> and if the rent for the year was payable the day after the transfer, the transferee would be entitled to the whole year's rent. To remove this anomaly, the section enacts that all periodical payments in the nature of rent, annuities, dividends and pensions shall be deemed to accrue from day to day, and be apportioned between the transferor and transferee on that basis.

(2) Scope of the Indian Rule

The Indian rule is limited, for it is restricted to transfer inter vivos, and does not apply to liabilities. The apportionment which the section contemplates is one following the transfer of the interest of the person entitled to receive the rent, and not the transfer of the interest of the person bound to pay it.<sup>45</sup> A lessor transferring his interest to the assignee of the lessee is entitled to an apportionment of rent upto the date of the merger.<sup>46</sup> When a decree is passed for the redemption of a mortgage, the apportionment of the rents of the mortgaged property is made as from the date when money is paid for redemption, and not from the date of the decree.<sup>47</sup>

The section does not apply to transfers by operation of law as these are excluded by s 2(d). A purchaser at an execution sale acquires title by operation of law, and the rule of apportionment does not apply to execution sales.<sup>48</sup>

Illustration

A mortgage brought the mortgaged property to sale and bought the property himself at the court sale in November 1922. The rent for the year was payable on 1 April 1923. The mortgagor claimed that the rent should be apportioned and that he should receive the rent from 1 April 1922 till November 1922. But as it was an execution sale s 36 did not apply, and the mortgagee was held to be entitled to the whole year's rent payable on 1 April 1923.<sup>49</sup>

Similarly, it has been held that s 36 does not apply to cases of partition, for a partition is not a 'transfer';<sup>50</sup> nor can the principle of the section be applied to such cases as, unlike cases of execution sales or succession where the transferee acquires a right to the property by the transaction, in the case of a partition, the person to whom a particular portion is allotted always had a right in that portion.<sup>51</sup>

Prepaid rent is not rent, but a loan.<sup>52</sup>

The section is applicable only between the transferor and transferee.<sup>53</sup>

(3) No rule of Apportionment in the Act Apart from Section

These limitations on the section have not always been observed. In one case<sup>54</sup> the lessor had only a life interest, and died a month before the rent of the half year was payable. Here there was no question of a transfer, and yet the assignee of the lessor was held to be entitled to an apportionment of rent for the period up to the death of the lessor. Again, in another case<sup>55</sup> the liability to pay rent was apportioned between the lessee and his assignee, and in a third case<sup>56</sup> the rule of apportionment was applied between a lessor and the purchaser of his interest at an execution sale. This decision has been followed by the Madras High Court.<sup>57</sup> The rule has also been applied in the case of devolution of interest on succession.<sup>58</sup> In all these cases the rule was applied as an equity. It is submitted, however, that this is erroneous, and that there is no such equity. A general rule of apportionment by time was then introduced by statute. The Indian rule is limited to transfers inter vivos.

(4) Maintenance

A Hindu widow's right to maintenance accrues from day to day. Therefore, on the death of a Hindu widow, her heirs are entitled to recover the maintenance allowance upto the day of her death, although the allowance has, for the convenience of the parties, been expressed to be payable on a fixed date.<sup>59</sup>

(5) 'Other Periodical Payment'

The same expression is used in the English Apportionment Act 1870 and as to it, Lord Selbourne said-- 'They must be payments which are made periodically, recurring at fixed times, not at variable periods, nor in the exercise of the discretion of one or more individuals, but from some antecedent obligation; and, further, they must be in the nature of income; that is, coming in from some kind of investment'.<sup>60</sup> The expression does not, therefore, include the profits of a partnership which accrue only after the adjustment of accounts,<sup>61</sup> nor the profits in a share of a village.<sup>62</sup>

Whenever there are periodical payments accruing, and the event which calls for apportionment occurs, the TP Act is at once brought into operation and must be applied, and when subsequently the accruing payments become due and payable, they must be distributed in accordance with the TP Act.<sup>63</sup>

(6) Sums Due Before the Event

Sums due in advance and due before the event which calls for apportionment are not apportioned. So where rent was payable quarterly in advance, and the landlord re-entered for non-payment of rent during the quarter, he was entitled to recover the whole rent.<sup>64</sup>

(7) Payable

The section makes it clear that the apportionment does not affect the date when the payment is to be made by the person liable. Thus, if under a lease, rent is payable at the end of the year, an assignment by the lessor of his interest in the middle of the year will result in the transferor and the transferee being each entitled to half the rent, but the lessee still remains liable to pay only at the end of the year.<sup>65</sup>

(8) Contract or Local Usage

The rule may be excluded by contract or local usage. Similarly, where a managing agent assigned his entire interest in the agency, the court inferred a contract to the contrary, and the transferor had no right to the commission for the period prior to the date of transfer.<sup>66</sup>

In the case of agricultural rents, the Allahabad High Court makes the apportionment with reference not to the rent of the whole year, but with reference to the rent of the season in which the crop was reaped.<sup>67</sup> In a Rangoon case,<sup>68</sup> the court observed that agricultural rents are not apportionable as they accrue once and for all when the crops are reaped, and do not accrue from day to day. This, it would appear, is not correct, for it is precisely because rents do not accrue from day to day that the rule of apportionment has been applied to them by this section. A similar observation as to agricultural rents occurs in a Calcutta case,<sup>69</sup> but there the apportionment was by estate, and the reference to s 36 seems to have been a mistake for s 37. Agricultural rents are excepted from the operation of s 37, but are subject to apportionment by time under s 36.

Under s 225 of the Agra Tenancy Act (Uttar Pradesh Act 3 of 1936) agricultural profits were divisible on fixed dates between the co-sharers. However, on the principle of this section it has been held that the co-sharer's right accrues from day to day. Therefore, his suit for a share of the profits is not premature if filed before the fixed date, and the amount due at the date of suit can be ascertained by apportionment.<sup>70</sup>

Apportionment of benefit of obligation on severance

--When, in consequence of a transfer, property is divided and held in several shares, and thereupon the benefit of any obligation relating to the property as a whole passes from one to several owners of the property, the corresponding duty shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, amongst the owners, be performed in favour of each of such owners in proportion to the value of his share in the property, provided that the duty can be severed and that the severance does not substantially increase the burden of the obligation; but if the duty cannot be severed, or if the severance would substantially increase the burden of the obligation the duty shall be performed for the benefit of such one of the several owners as they shall jointly designate for that purpose:

Provided that no person on whom the burden of the obligation lies shall be answerable for failure to discharge it in a manner provided by this section, unless and until he has had reasonable notice of the severance.

Nothing in this section applies to leases for agricultural purposes unless and until the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette so directs.

Illustrations

- (a) A sells to B, C and D a house situated in a village and leased to E at an annual rent of Rs 30 and delivery of one fat sheep, B having provided half the purchase-money, and C and D one quarter each. E, having notice of this, must pay Rs 15 to B, Rs 7½ to C, and Rs 7½; to D, and must deliver the sheep according to the joint direction of B, C and D.
- (b) In the same case, each house in the village being bound to provide 10 days' labour each year on a dyke to prevent inundation, E had agreed as a term of his lease to perform this work for A. B, C and D severally require E to perform the 10 days' work due on account of the house of each. E is not bound to do more than 10 days' work in all, according to such directions as B, C and D may join in giving.

(1) Apportionment by Estate

This section refers to apportionment by estate, while the last section dealt with apportionment by time.

Prior to the TP Act, when a tenure was severed by the sale of shares in the reversion, the tenant was still obliged to pay the rent to all the sharers jointly, unless an apportionment had been agreed to by all the parties, or had been ordered in a suit to which all concerned were parties.<sup>71</sup> If such an agreement had been arrived at, it was binding on the tenant.<sup>72</sup>

However, under the present section, notice to the tenant is sufficient to convert the single obligation to pay rent to all into a several obligation to pay rent to each co-sharer. On receipt of the notice, the tenant is under an obligation to pay each sharer his proportionate part of the rent,<sup>73</sup> but if a suit is necessary to enforce this obligation, it is still necessary to join all the sharers as parties.<sup>74</sup> If no apportionment is made, the obligation remains single, and the lessor will not be allowed to split the tenancy by recovering the rent of a part only,<sup>75</sup> nor can a purchaser of a part insist on payment of rent of his part only.<sup>76</sup>

If a putnidar pays the land revenue payable to the zamindar direct to the treasury, that is a payment which can be apportioned between the co-sharers in the zamindari.<sup>77</sup> If an estate consisting of several villages is apportioned, the division should be made according to the existing rents, and not those at the creation of the original tenure.<sup>78</sup> Provision is also made in s 109 for apportionment of rent by agreement between all parties. Payment of rent by a tenant in good faith and without notice of a transfer is protected by s 50.

(2) Benefit of Any Obligation

Rent is not the only instance of the benefit of an obligation attached to property, which is capable of being apportioned. When the lessor sells portions of the property leased, the covenants which run with the land run with the severed portions. The lessee is bound to perform the various obligations imposed upon him in favour of each sharer in the reversion, so far as such obligations are capable of severance, and such performance will not be to his prejudice.<sup>79</sup>

(3) Does not Substantially Increase the Burden

This condition is the subject of the second illustration. There is a similar provision in s 30 of the Easements Act 1882, that the severance into shares of the dominant heritage should not increase the burden on the servient heritage. The principle may be illustrated by a case which is not, however, within the section. An agricultural holding fell to be divided so that the fields were allotted to one co-owner and the appurtenant farmhouse in the abadi to another. The tenant was still entitled to continue to occupy the farmhouse, rent free.<sup>80</sup>

(4) Provided that the Duty can be Severed

It must of course be possible to perform the duty separately, otherwise it must be performed jointly. This is explained in the first illustration where the duty to deliver a sheep cannot be severed.

(5) Notice

Notice may be given by the assignor or by the assignee.<sup>81</sup> The notice has of course no bearing on the title of the assignee.

(6) Section not Applicable

The section is subject to s 2(d) and is, therefore, not applicable to involuntary transfers or to cases of succession. The heirs of deceased creditors are only jointly entitled to enforce the right which the deceased, if alive, could singly enforce.<sup>82</sup>

(7) Agricultural Tenancies

These tenancies have been exempted, as the severance of the obligation to pay rent would cause much harassment to agriculturists.<sup>83</sup>

Transfer by person authorised only under certain circumstances to transfer

--Where any person, authorised only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose off immovable property, transfers such property for consideration, alleging the existence of such circumstances, they shall, as between the transferee on the one part and the transferor and other persons (if any) affected by the transfer on the other part, be deemed to have existed, if the transferee, after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances, has acted in good faith.

Illustration

A, a Hindu widow, whose husband has left collateral heirs, alleging that the property held by her as such is insufficient for her maintenance, agrees, for purposes neither religious nor charitable to sell a field, part of such property, to B. B satisfies himself by reasonable enquiry that the income of the property is insufficient for A's maintenance, and that the sale of the field is necessary, and acting in good faith, buys the field from A. As between B on the one part and A and the collateral heirs on the other part, a necessity for the sale shall be deemed to have existed.

(1) Rest of Chapter II Applies to Immovable Property only

This group of sections, ie, ss 38 to 53, applies to immovable property only. The preceding group, ie, ss 33 to 37, applies both to immovable and movable property.

(2) Limited Power of Transfer

The scope of this section is very restricted. It does not apply to cases falling under s 41 of benamidars or ostensible owners who can give no title except by estoppel; nor to cases under s 64 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882, of persons purchasing in good faith for consideration without notice of a trust. However, it refers to cases such as those arising under Hindu law where the power of transfer of the person representing the estate depends upon circumstances in their nature variable. Thus, a Hindu widow has no power to dispose of immovable property except for purposes which the Hindu law recognises as constituting legal necessity. The manager of a joint Hindu family has power to sell or mortgage joint family property only for purposes of legal necessity, or for debts incurred in the family business, or for the benefit of the estate. The father of a joint Hindu family may sell or mortgage joint family property to discharge his own antecedent debt not incurred for an immoral or an illegal purpose. So also, the natural guardian of a Hindu minor has power to sell or mortgage any part of the minor's estate in case of necessity or for the benefit of the estate. A transfer in excess of such limited power is voidable, but the transferee is protected if he has made inquiries with reasonable care, and has acted honestly in the real belief that there were justifying circumstances.

The section would appear to be based on the leading case of Hunnooman Persaud v Baboee,<sup>84</sup> and particularly the following passage:

The power of a manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is under the Hindu law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in case of need, or for the benefit of the estate.... The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded .... Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate. But they think that if he does so inquire, and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably-credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge, and they do not think that under such circumstances, he is bound to see to the application of the money.

This principle applies not only to the case of a manager for an infant, but also to alienations by a Hindu widow, or other limited heir,<sup>85</sup> and to transactions in which a father in derogation of the rights of his son under Mitakshara law has made an alienation of an ancestral family estate.<sup>86</sup> It also applies to alienations by a mohunt or shebait of debtor property.<sup>87</sup> An executor under pure Hindu law has no greater powers than the manager of a minor's estate.<sup>88</sup>

(3) Circumstances in their Nature Variable

This expression refers, in cases of Hindu alienations, to the facts that constitute legal necessity in Hindu law. These vary according to the facts of each case, and the status of the transferor. A stepmother purporting to act on behalf of a minor stepson is a person authorized 'only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose off immovable property'.<sup>89</sup> The transaction must be judged in the circumstances prevailing at the time it took place, and not by subsequent events.<sup>90</sup>

(4) Before Transfer

The section has no application before transfer where the transaction is still incomplete.<sup>91</sup>

(5) Onus of Proof

The onus of proving justifying circumstances is on the transferee. Where a mortgagee from a Hindu widow seeks to enforce his mortgage, the onus is on him to prove that the money was borrowed for a legitimate purpose.<sup>92</sup> One who claims title under a conveyance from a woman, with the usual limited interest which a woman takes, and who seeks to enforce that title against reversioners, is always subject to proving not only the genuineness of his conveyance, but the full comprehension by the limited owners of the nature of the alienation she was making, and also that the alienation was justified by necessity, or at least that the alienee did all that was reasonable to satisfy himself of the existence of such necessity.<sup>93</sup> Actual proof of the necessity which justified the deed is not essential to its validity; it is only necessary that a representation should have been made to the purchaser that such necessity existed, and that he should have acted honestly and made proper inquiry to satisfy himself of its truth.<sup>94</sup> If the alienation is by a father for payment of antecedent debts, the burden is on the transferee to prove that the debt existed, or that after proper inquiry he honestly believed that it existed.<sup>95</sup> The burden is then shifted on the son to show that the debt was contracted for an immoral purpose, and that the transferee had actual or constructive notice of the nature of the debt.<sup>96</sup> It has been stated in a Madras case<sup>97</sup> that whereas in the case of an alienation for necessities, the transferee need not actually prove the existence of the necessity, and that he can claim the benefit of s 38 if he shows that he had made reasonable inquiries, in the case of an alienation for an antecedent debt, the transferee must show the existence of the debt as otherwise 'it would not be held that the enquiry was full or bona fide'. This distinction would appear to be unsound, for it would be a question of fact whether the transferee had used reasonable care and acted in good faith in the circumstances of each case.

Recitals by the transferor are not generally sufficient proof of necessity,<sup>98</sup> for they may only have been inserted at the instance of the transferee.<sup>99</sup> They must, therefore, be supplemented by evidence aliunde.<sup>1</sup> A sale deed executed by a Hindu widow recited the payment of family debts as the necessity justifying the sale. But the purchaser made no inquiry of the creditors named in the deed and was, therefore, not protected by this section.<sup>2</sup> However, as time goes by and the original parties to the transaction and all those who could have given evidence have passed away, recitals assume greater importance, and if the circumstances are such as to justify a reasonable belief that an inquiry would have confirmed their truth, they would be sufficient to support the deed.<sup>3</sup> In such cases presumptions are admissible to fill in details which have been obliterated by time.<sup>4</sup>

The lender is not bound to see to the application of the money.<sup>5</sup> In the judgment in Hunooman Persaud's case LJ Knight Bruce said:

The purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future, as regards the actual application, and a lender can rarely have, unless he enters on the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application. Their Lordships do not think that a bona fide creditor should suffer when he has acted honestly and with due caution, but is himself deceived.

Accordingly, a sale or mortgage may be justified by legal necessity although as to part of the consideration, such necessity has not been established.<sup>6</sup> The Allahabad High Court has held that this was so only when the unaccounted part was small, but not if it was considerable.<sup>7</sup> However, this view was disapproved by the Privy Council, and it was held that if the sale itself is justified by legal necessity, and the purchaser pays a fair price for the property sold, and acts in good faith after due inquiry as to the necessity for the sale, the mere fact that part of the price is not proved to have been applied to the purposes of necessity does not invalidate the sale, and the sale should be upheld unconditionally, irrespective of whether the part proved to have been applied to the purposes of necessity is considerable or small.<sup>8</sup>

Transfer where third person is entitled to maintenance

--Where a third person has a right to receive maintenance, or a provision for advancement or marriage, from the profits of immovable property, and such property is transferred, ... the right may be enforced against the transferee, if he has notice thereof or if the transfer is gratuitous; but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right, nor against such property in his hands.

(1) Amendment

The original section was amended by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) Maintenance not a Charge

The right of maintenance, even of a Hindu widow, is an indefinite right which falls short of a charge.<sup>9</sup> It is not a charge unless it has been made a charge by decree or agreement,<sup>10</sup> or unless the widow is in possession of specific property allotted for her maintenance.<sup>11</sup> In such cases, notice of the charge is sufficient to bind the transferee. However, in some cases it had been held that a charge for maintenance created by a decree was binding on a transferee irrespective of whether he had notice of the charge.<sup>12</sup> Those decisions proceeded on the view that the effect of a charge was similar to that of a mortgage, in that it placed a limitation on the ownership of the property.<sup>13</sup> Those decisions, however, were not correct, for even before the Amending Act of 1929 it was clear that a charge did not, like a mortgage, create an interest in property,<sup>14</sup> and the amended s 100 expressly enacts that a charge cannot be enforced against a transferee for consideration without notice. This section purports to deal with a right of maintenance or the like which, not having been made a charge by decree or agreement, falls short of a charge.<sup>15</sup>

(3) Right under the Amended Section

Under the amended section, the right of the widow is more effectively protected. It is not necessary that the transferee should be aware of an intention to defraud the widow or to defeat her right to maintenance.<sup>16</sup> If he is a transferee for consideration, he takes subject to the right if he has notice of it. If he is a gratuitous transferee, he takes subject to the right, irrespective of whether he has notice of it. The amended section is not intended to create a charge where none existed. The effect of the amendment is to make it unnecessary for the widow to prove that the transfer was made with the intention of defeating her right.<sup>17</sup>

(4) Enhanced Maintenance

It has been held<sup>18</sup> that the right to receive maintenance protected by the section is not merely the right to receive such maintenance in the first instance, but also the right to receive enhanced maintenance in the future if there has been a material change in the circumstances.

(5) Right of Residence

Where, by way of settlement of disputes between the husband and the wife, property is given to the wife by the husband for her separate residence during her lifetime, it is a part of the arrangement for the grant of maintenance. Subsequent alienation by the husband cannot divest her from her possession till her death, and the transferee (from the husband) is not entitled to possession till her death. Section 39 applies to such a situation. The word 'maintenance' in the section covers residence also.<sup>19</sup>

(6) Maintenance not Secured by Decree

Under Hindu Law, the maintenance of a wife by her husband is, of course, a matter of personal obligation which attaches from the moment of marriage. From the date of marriage her home is necessarily in her husband's home. He is bound to maintain her in if she is willing to reside with him and discharge her duties. The doctrine of maintenance of a wife can be traced to the smritis, and the principal Hindu commentaries upon them. These texts enjoin a mandatory duty upon the husband to maintain his wife. The duty does not depend upon the husband possessing any property. It imposes a personal obligation on him enforceable by the sovereign or state. However, this does not mean that the obligation is not referred at all to his property, and that he can alienate all his property and deprive his wife of the right to maintenance from the income of his property. The personal obligation on the part of the husband to maintain the wife is even wider, in the sense that his obligation will exist if he has no properties from which he could derive any income. Even according to the ancient texts, the wife was supposed to be a co-owner of her husband's property, though in a secondary sense. The Hindu female's right to maintenance is a tangible right against property flowing from the relationship between the husband and wife and is recognised, and has been strongly stressed even by the earlier Hindu jurists starting from Yajnavalkya to Manu. Even without a charge, the claim for maintenance is doubtless a pre-existing right enforceable against the property in the hands of alienee with notice of her claim.<sup>20</sup>

It is not necessary that the right to maintenance should become crystallised in the form of a decree to enable the wife to proceed against the property in the hands of the husband or his transferees. Merely because, at the time when the settlement deed was executed, the wife had not obtained a decree for maintenance would not mean that she will not be entitled to enforce the right of maintenance against the property gratuitously transferred by the husband in favour of the concubine. Once it is seen that the husband had gifted the properties in favour of the concubine without making provision for the maintenance of the wife, then the wife will be entitled to have a charge against the very properties, and enforce the same.<sup>21</sup>

The Hindu law texts enjoin a mandatory duty upon the husband to maintain his wife. That duty is not dependent upon the husband's possession of any property. A wife is treated under the ancient texts as a co-owner of the husband's property, though in a secondary sense. It is not open to a husband to effect an alienation of his properties, when such alienation has the effect of depriving her and other dependants of their maintenance. A wife is thus, entitled to be maintained out of the profits of her husband's property. A wife and children can, therefore, have a charge upon the properties of the husband, and can enforce the same against a gratuitous transferee.<sup>22</sup>

(7) Notice

The provision as to notice marks the difference between the old section and the new. Under the old section, the transferee was not bound, unless he had notice of the intention to defeat the right of the widow. Under the new section, notice of the existence of the right is sufficient to bind the transferee.<sup>23</sup> If he is a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration without notice, he is not bound.<sup>24</sup> Under s 3, the notice may be either actual or constructive. Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that the expression 'notice' used should have a broad connotation, and cannot be construed literally to mean an information given. Aptly, it should mean knowledge and awareness. It was held that as long as a right exists under the law, it is obvious notice to one and all.<sup>25</sup>

(8) Enforceability as Between the Mother and Son Irrespective of Notice

As a woman is entitled to maintenance not only from the husband, but also from sons who were members of a joint family, the wife has a right to ask for a charge on the entire family property irrespective of whether they had effected division between them. A son cannot plead want of notice about his mother being entitled to get maintenance from out of the income of the joint family property. Partition can have no impact whatsoever on the mother's right.<sup>26</sup>

(9) Family Debts

Under the Hindu law, debts contracted for the benefit of the family take precedence over a widow's claim for maintenance,<sup>27</sup> and if family property is alienated for the discharge of debts binding on the family, the right of the alienee overrides the right of the widow, even if he had notice of her claim for maintenance.<sup>28</sup> However, when maintenance has been expressly charged on the property, it takes precedence over the right of an execution purchaser even though the decree was for a debt binding on the family.<sup>29</sup> Although the husband's debts may override the widow's claim for maintenance, she has a right to challenge debts incurred by a coparcener, such as a son or a brother of her deceased husband, and to enforce her rights against the property sold to pay off those debts, unless it be proved that they had been incurred for family necessity.<sup>30</sup>

(10) Advancement

Provisions for advancement are unknown among Indians.<sup>31</sup> The rule of English law by which a child who has received an advancement must bring the amount into hotchpot in the case the father's intestacy had been omitted in the Indian Succession Act 1925; and has been held not to apply to Parsees.<sup>32</sup> Among persons subject to English law, a purchase by a father in the name of a daughter is presumed to be an advancement, and not to be benami or colourable.<sup>33</sup>

(11) Marriage

Under Mitakshara law, joint family property is liable for the legitimate marriage expenses of male members of the family,<sup>34</sup> and their daughters.<sup>35</sup> Under this section as amended, a transferee having notice of such liability at the time of transfer would take subject to it.

Burden of obligation imposing restriction on use of land

--Where, for the more beneficial enjoyment of his own immovable property, a third person has, independently of any interest in the immovable property of another or of any easement thereon, a right to restrain the enjoyment in a particular manner of the latter property, or

Or of obligation annexed to ownership but not amounting to interest or easement.--Where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract, and annexed to the ownership of immovable property, but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon, such right or obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof or a gratuitous transferee of the property affected thereby, but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right or obligation, nor against such property in his hands.

A contracts to sell Sultanpur to B. While the contract is still in force he sells Sultanpur to C, who has notice of the contract. B may enforce the contract against C to the same extent as against A.

(1) Amendment

This section was amended by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) First Paragraph-- Right of Transferor Against Purchaser from Transferee

The second para of s 11 relates to right of transferor as against the transferee to (1) enforce the performance of an affirmative covenant; (2) restrain breach of a negative covenant. The first para of present section relates to the right of transferor as against a purchaser from a transferee to restrain the breach of a negative covenant. This paragraph, before it was amended, also recognised the right of the transferor to compel the performance of an affirmative covenant as against a purchaser from the transferee. It contained the words 'to compel its enjoyment,' but those words have now been omitted. The effect of the omission is that an affirmative covenant can no longer be enforced against a purchaser from a transferee. The reason for the amendment is explained under s 11.

The 'third person' spoken of in the first paragraph is either the original covenantee, or his transferee. For instance, if A owns two properties X and Y, and sells X to B, he may impose a restriction on B that he shall, for the more beneficial enjoyment of Y, keep open a portion of X adjoining Y and not build on it. The 'third person' may be A who has no longer any interest in X or any easement thereon, or he may be a purchaser of Y from A whom we shall call C. If B sells X to D, and D has notice of the covenant and D threatens to build on the whole of X, A or C may restrain D from doing so.

(3) Restrictive Covenants

In English law, a covenant may be something more than a mere agreement. A covenant may (1) amount to the grant or reservation of an equitable interest in land or an easement; or (2) it may be a personal contract. If the covenant creates or reserves a legal easement, the transferee takes subject to the easement; if it creates or reserves an equitable interest in land, the transferee takes subject to that interest, unless he acquires a legal estate without notice or is protected by want of registration. If the covenant is only a personal contract, the general rule of English common law is that all contracts are personal and the covenant does not bind the transferee. To this general rule that contracts are personal there are two exceptions-- (1) leases; and (2) covenants annexed to the land.

The law in India closely follows the law of England as to covenants. The benefit of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease may be enforced by the assignee of the lessee under s 108(c), while the rights and liabilities of the lessor's transferee are dealt with in s 109.

The principle that a covenant is annexed to the land, if it binds the land in its inception or affects the nature, quality or value of the land, was adopted by the Calcutta High Court in Mathewson v Ram Kanai Singh.<sup>36</sup> Such covenants are referred to in ss 55(2) (sale), 65 (mortgage), and 108(c) (lease), where it is expressly enacted that the benefit of such covenants runs with the interest of the covenantee.

The equitable rule that the burden of a covenant runs with the land is enacted in this section. The amendment of the section by Act 20 of 1929 represents the English rule which limits the doctrine to restrictive covenants, for a positive covenant never runs with the land either in law, or in equity.<sup>37</sup> Even before the amendment, the Bombay High Court doubted if the section applied to affirmative covenants involving the expenditure of money. In Chaturbhuj v Mansukhram,<sup>38</sup> the owner of four houses and a chowk or courtyard sold three houses and the chowk to the plaintiff, and covenanted to close the window of the fourth house overlooking the chowk, and to slope the eaves so as to prevent rain water falling onto the chowk. The owner then sold the fourth house to the defendant. The plaintiff sued the defendant to enforce the covenants, but the suit was dismissed on the ground that even if the covenants were restrictive covenants (which the court held they were not), the defendant had purchased without notice of the covenants. In this case the vendor was the covenantor, but the more usual case is for the vendor to be the covenantee as in Tulk v Moxhay,<sup>39</sup> wherein it was held that in equity, a restrictive covenant imposed for the benefit of land retained by the lessor or grantor was binding on a purchaser with notice. In other words, a covenant restricting the user of land runs with the land in equity. This doctrine applies only to restrictive or negative covenants. The doctrine cannot be extended to affirmative covenants such as a covenant compelling a man to lay out money, or to do an act of an active character. The covenant must be one restricting or affecting the user of the land, and the remedy is not the remedy at law by way of specific performance under a specific or implied penalty, but merely in equity by injunction against the violation of the covenant.<sup>40</sup>

The case law in India as to restrictive covenants is meagre, and it has not yet been decided whether a restrictive covenant would be binding on a trespasser, or a mere occupier. The section expressly says that the right of the covenantee is not an interest in the land bound by the covenant, nor an easement. It is not an interest because the TP Act does not recognize equitable estates,<sup>41</sup> and it cannot be said as Sir George Jessel said that if the covenant 'binds the land it creates an equitable interest in the land'.<sup>42</sup> But although the section says that the right is not an easement, it would probably be held that the covenantee had a paramount right analogous to an easement and, therefore, binding on an occupier or trespasser.

(4) Building Schemes

A covenantor may sometimes be entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant as against other covenantors. This may occur when land is sold in plots under a building scheme. The conditions of sale prescribed restrictive covenants to be entered into by the purchasers of each lot, and the presumption is that the covenant is for their mutual benefit.<sup>43</sup> In Torbay Hotel v Jenkins,<sup>44</sup> the court said--

Where an owner of land deals with his land on the footing of imposing restrictive obligations on the use of the various portions of it and as when he alienates them for the common benefit of himself (so far as he retains any land) and of the various purchasers inter se, a court of Equity will give effect to this common intention, notwithstanding the absence of mutual covenants, provided that the intention that there should be a mutual obligation is efficiently established.

If no such intention is established, the benefit of the covenant will not pass, for it would be merely a personal covenant. This was the case in Chambers v Randall,<sup>45</sup> where the vendor sold plots for building purposes with covenants restrictive of the nature of the building to be erected, and J Sargent said that 'the object of the covenant was to enable the vendor to protect his property while he retained it, and to make the most of it when he disposed it off.' On the other hand, if the intention is established, each purchaser or his assignee can enforce the covenant against the other purchasers.<sup>46</sup> However, there must be reasonably clear definition as to the area within which the mutual obligations are intended to operate.<sup>47</sup>

A covenant by a purchaser not to use burdened property 'for any purpose other than that of a single private dwelling house' does not mean that any number of dwelling houses may be erected on the land, provided that each is used only as a single private dwelling house. The contention that any number of private dwelling houses could be constructed was negatived by the court.<sup>48</sup>

(5) Affirmative Covenants

Affirmative covenants are collateral; they are not annexed to the land and do not run with the land. Covenants to lay out money in building or repairs cannot be enforced against the purchaser from the covenantor.<sup>49</sup> A positive covenant never runs with the land either in law, or in equity.<sup>50</sup>

In Halsall v Brizell,<sup>51</sup> however, J Upjohn was considering the case of a developed estate in which the developers retained the ownership of roads and sewers. Under certain covenants, the developers were obliged to permit purchasers of properties in the estate to use them, and the purchasers were obliged to contribute towards the cost. The question arose whether the successors of the original purchasers were bound to contribute to the cost of the roads and sewers. The court held that the successors could not be sued on the covenant for it was a positive covenant, which did not run with the land, but that it is 'ancient law that a man cannot take benefit under a deed without subscribing to the obligations thereunder'. The court held that the successors had no right to use the roads and sewers except under the deed, and that as they desired to take its benefits, they were bound by the covenants contained in it.<sup>52</sup>

A covenant of indemnity is a personal covenant, and is, therefore, not a covenant running with the land, and cannot be enforced by a purchaser of the land.<sup>53</sup> A covenant in a sale deed by which the vendor retained a certain portion of the land free from payment of land revenue did not amount to a covenant by the vendors or their heirs and transferees to pay the land revenue in respect of the lands retained by the vendor, and that even if it did, it was not binding on the heirs or transferees for it was not a covenant running with land.<sup>54</sup> A covenant for the reconveyance of a right of easement is also a personal covenant, and does not run with the land.<sup>55</sup>

Illustration

A, a Hindu female, sold a plot of land in which she had only a limited interest (as a daughter under Hindu law as interpreted in Madras) to B. Her husband, D executed an agreement of indemnity agreeing to convey to B an equivalent plot of land, in case B should be dispossessed. B sold the land to P who after the death of A was dispossessed by A's son. P then sued D on the agreement of indemnity to recover possession of the equivalent plot of land. The suit was dismissed, as an agreement of indemnity is a collateral agreement and not a covenant running with the land. There was, moreover, no privity of a contract between P and D.<sup>56</sup>

In an Allahabad case,<sup>57</sup> an affirmative covenant to pull down rooms on a passage was enforced against a transferee from the vendee, but the case was decided on the law as it stood before the amendment of the section.

Leases--

Leases have always been an exception to this rule, and a covenant to pay rent is a covenant annexed to the land, and the benefit of it passes to the lessor's assignee--s 109. The lessee's assignee is liable by privity of estate.<sup>58</sup> On the other hand, in the case of a sale, a covenant to pay money is purely a personal covenant, and cannot run with the land. Should a vendee covenant on behalf of himself, his heirs and assigns, that he or they would pay Rs 20 annually for the sheba of a thakur, a subsequent purchaser is not bound by the covenant, for there is no such thing between a vendor and purchaser as a covenant to pay money running with the land.<sup>59</sup> In an Allahabad case,<sup>60</sup> a covenant that the vendee would pay the vendor zarichaharam, ie, a fourth of the purchase money, in case he sold the land, was held not to run with the land. The court dissented from a previous decision,<sup>61</sup> but omitted to notice that it was a case of lease. Between a head lessor and a sub-lessee, there is neither privity of contract, nor privity of estate. A sub-lessee, is therefore, not liable for a covenant in the lease to pay a specified rent, such covenant being an affirmative covenant.<sup>62</sup>

(6) Covenant Running with the Land

This is an expression borrowed from English law of real property, where it describes a covenant 'annexed to the land' and which is an exception to the general rule that all covenants are personal. A covenant may run with the land (i) at law; or (ii) in equity.

- (i) A covenant runs with the land at law when the benefit of it passes to the assignee of the covenantee or when the burden of it passes to the assignee of the covenantor, and, in either case independently of notice. A grants subsoil rights below his surface land to a colliery company who covenants to pay damages if they cause a subsidence of the surface land. A sells his surface land to B. B can enforce the covenant because it is a covenant the benefit of which runs with the land at law.<sup>63</sup> The burden of a covenant only runs at law in the case of an assignment of a lease.

- (ii) A covenant runs with the land in equity when the burden of it can be enforced against the assignee of the covenantor under the rule in Tulk v Moxhay. A sells a park in front of his house to B who covenants not to build upon it. B sells the park to C who has notice of the covenant. A can enforce the covenant against C, for it is a covenant running with the land in equity.

Indian law--

Under the TP Act, covenants of which the benefit runs with the land at law are covenants for title implied in sales under s 55(2), the covenant implied in mortgages under s 65, and in respect of leases, the covenant for quiet enjoyment implied in s 108(c). A covenant to pay rents and taxes is a covenant that runs with the land;<sup>64</sup> so also is a covenant in a lease that the lessee will pay the lessor a share of the purchase money if he should assign the lease;<sup>65</sup> or a covenant in a patni lease that the covenantor shall submit year after year in the landlords' office jamavahipatiaks and lawazama patika;<sup>66</sup> or a covenant granting to the lessor the right to use certain roads.<sup>67</sup> As these covenants run with the land at law, they are enforceable by any person in whom the interest in the property of the covenantee is vested, irrespective of notice.

Under the TP Act, covenants that run with the land in equity are the restrictive covenants referred to in the first paragraph of this section where the rule in Tulk v Moxhay is followed. As these covenants run with the land in equity, they cannot be enforced against a purchaser for value without notice as stated in the last paragraph of the section.

Pre-emption--

Covenants for pre-emption have been described as covenants running with the land.<sup>68</sup> This use of the expression was deprecated by J Strachey,<sup>69</sup> and it is altogether incorrect. Such covenants are personal and collateral covenants falling under the second paragraph of the section. This has now been clearly held by the Supreme Court,<sup>70</sup> and the decisions referred to above to the contrary are no longer good law.

Illustration

A sells his field to B who covenants that if he wishes to sell it, he will give A the first refusal. B sells the field to C who has notice of the agreement for Rs 1,000. A may require C to sell the field to him for Rs 1,000. This illustration should be contrasted with the two preceding illustrations which were of covenants running with the land at law and in equity. The covenant in this illustration is not annexed to the land at all. It is purely a personal covenant and is enforceable for personal reasons. It was unconscionable of B to break his agreement and sell to C and, as C had notice of the agreement, it was equally unconscionable of him to buy.

Agreement to pay commission on extraction of coal--

An agreement to pay commission on coal extracted from a mine and sold, is not a covenant running with the land.<sup>71</sup>

(7) Covenants in a Lease and Assignment

A covenant entered between a lessor and a lessee is personally binding between the two. However, upon an assignment of the reversion or a term, it may be binding on the assignee. Similarly, the benefit of the covenant may pass to them. If the covenant is by the lessor for the benefit of the lessee, and directly touches the land, it runs with the land in favour of the assignee. An option to renew the lease runs with the land. In the case in question both the covenants to put up a building and to renew the lease, run with the land. The liability to put up a building having been discharged by the original lessee, the right to exercise the option of renewing the lease passed to the assignee. The contention that every assignee of a part of the tenement is bound to put up a building on the parcel of the land assigned to him, is unreasonable and by the very nature of things is impossible of performance. The leasehold interest having been served by agreement of the parties, each of the assignees was entitled to enforce the term providing for the renewal so far as his separate part was concerned, irrespective of the others.<sup>72</sup>

(8) Contractual Obligation

The right referred to in the first paragraph of the section has come into existence before the transfer, and presupposes ownership of property. The right referred to in the second paragraph has also come into existence before the transfer, but does not presuppose ownership of property. It is a purely personal right arising out of contract, and the person who has the right need not be the owner of any property at all. But the right though personal, must be annexed to the ownership of immovable property. The illustration shows that the purchaser under a contract of sale of land has the right defined in the second paragraph. That right in English law is an equitable estate in land. But, as explained in s 5, the Indian legislature has eschewed the doctrine of equitable ownership. According to s 3 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882, what would be in English law the equitable estate of the cestui que trust is the benefit of an obligation annexed to the ownership of property. Section 54 of TP Act expressly states that a contract of sale of immovable property does not, of itself, create an interest in or charge upon such property, but it creates an obligation, the fiduciary character of which is recognized in s 3 of the Specific Relief Act 1963, and in s 91 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882. A contract for sale, therefore, does not create an interest in land, but creates a personal obligation of a fiduciary character which can be enforced by a suit for specific performance not only against the vendor, but also against a volunteer and a purchaser for consideration with notice.<sup>73</sup> A contract of sale (as provided by last two paragraphs of s 40) creates an obligation annexed to ownership of property.<sup>74</sup>

A reading of ss 40 and 54 of the TP Act and s 91 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 makes it clear that the subsequent transferee with notice stands in a fiduciary capacity and holds the property in trust to the prior agreement holder, but the prior agreement holder cannot automatically become the owner by seeking declaratory relief, and has to necessarily file a suit for specific performance impleading both the vendor and the subsequent transferee.<sup>75</sup>

In some cases, this fiduciary obligation has been held to be a defence to a suit for ejectment although no suit for specific performance had been filed. But these cases are, in effect, overruled by the decision of the Privy Council in Main Pir Bus v Sardar Mahomed Tahar.<sup>76</sup>

An agreement to pay maintenance out of land, which fell short of creating a charge on any specific property has been said to create a contractual obligation under the second paragraph of this section, and not to be enforceable against a purchaser without notice.<sup>77</sup> However, where an agreement creates a perpetual charge such as for the payment of an annuity out of a specific property, it is binding on the subsequent transferee for value with notice or a volunteer with or without notice.<sup>78</sup>

It has been held that the second para of s 40 does not apply to rights in the nature of easements.<sup>79</sup> The Supreme Court has held that the liability to pay for the estate under s 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act 1953, arises upon the death of the real owner and not of the benamidar, who is merely an ostensible owner.<sup>80</sup>

Where a simple mortgage deed was executed in favour of the plaintiff and the mortgagor thereafter sold a part of the mortgaged property to another person by a registered sale deed and the earlier mortgage-deed was registered at a later date, it was held in the suit filed by the plaintiff against the mortgagor and the purchaser to recover the mortgage amount, the purchaser cannot claim that the mortgage was not binding on him on the ground that as the mortgage deed was registered at a date later than the date of sale in his favour, he should be taken to be a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the mortgage and, therefore, entitled to protection under second para of s 40. Under s 58 of the TP Act, mortgage is a mode of transfer by which an interest in property is created. An interest in property then would not remain simplicitor an obligation arising out of a contract and thus, stands excluded from falling within the protection of the second para of s 40.<sup>81</sup>

Even under the second para of s 40 there must be a right or obligation for that purpose arising out of a contract and annexed to the ownership of immovable property for the purpose of its enforcement against a gratuitous transferee or a transferee for consideration with the notice of the right or obligation.<sup>82</sup> Where, even though property was agreed to be sold at Rs 3,50,000/-, it was sold subsequently for Rs 61,000/-, it was held that it is the bounden duty of the purchaser to make all such necesary inquiries and to ascertain all the facts relating to the property to be purchased prior to committing in any manner and hence, he cannot simply come forward to put up a general plea that he is the bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, especially when the purchase is not for the proper value, which would only indicate sham and nominal.<sup>83</sup>

(9) Attachment

There is a conflict of decisions as to whether the obligation annexed by this section to the ownership of property by a contract of sale will prevail against claims enforceable under an attachment. If after a creditor C has attached A's property, and A sells it to B, the conveyance to B will be subject to the claims of C enforceable under the attachment. This is because under s 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 any private transfer by A after the attachment will be void as against such claims. The question, however, if the subsequent conveyance was in pursuance of an agreement of sale which was before the attachment, whether the claims of C enforceable under the attachment be subject to the obligation created by the contract of sale to B. In Taraknath v Sanatkumar,<sup>84</sup> J Cuming held that the contractual obligation could not prevail against the rights of attaching creditor. However, in Madan Mohan v Rebait Mohan,<sup>85</sup> J Woodroffe held that the contractual obligation prevailed over the attachment. The Madras High Court had taken the same view on the ground that if a creditor attaches property which is subject to a particular obligation, he should not be able to override it.<sup>86</sup> In the case of an attachment before judgment, this is so expressly provided by o 38, r 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. Again, if after the attachment the vendee filed a suit for specific performance of the contract and the court enforced execution of a conveyance, it is clear that such conveyance would not be a private transfer subject to the provisions of s 64 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908.<sup>87</sup> The right of a purchaser under s 40 entitling him to the benefit of an obligation arising out of the contract of sale of land by enforcing it against the transferee with notice is an equitable right, though not amounting to interest in immovable property within the meaning of s 53 of TP Act which declares that a contract of sale does not create an interest in the property. On this line of reasoning, it was held by the Madras High Court that the purchaser under an antecedent agreement gets a good title despite attachment.<sup>88</sup> The attaching creditor attaches only the right, title and interest of the debtor, and attachment cannot confer upon him any right higher than what the judgment debtor had at the date of attachment. Hence, under a contract of sale entered into before attachment, the conveyance and after attachment in pursuance of the contract, passes on good title inspite of the attachment.<sup>89</sup>

According to a recent Madras case which reiterates the earlier view of the high court, an attaching decree-holder attaches not the physical property, but only the right of the judgment debtor in the property. That right is, on the date of attachment, qualified by the obligation incurred by him under the earlier agreement to sell or mortgage and the attaching decree-holder cannot ignore that obligation, and cannot bring the property to sale as if it remained an absolute property of the judgment-debtor.<sup>90</sup>

Similar reasoning is to be found in a Calcutta case which would seem to follow the view taken by J Woodroffe in the case mentioned above. According to that high court, the attaching creditor attaches only the right, title and interest of the debtor, and attachment cannot confer upon him any higher right than the judgment debtor had at the date of attachment. Hence, if, under a contract of sale entered into before attachment, the promisee gets the conveyance after the attachment, he takes good title despite the attachment. Even if the property is sold in execution, he can enforce specific performance of his contract against the auction purchaser.<sup>91</sup>

According to the Punjab and Haryana High Court, a sale in pursuance of a pre-attachment agreement is a private alienation of property which must be regarded as void against the claim of a decree-holder, though not against the claims of other persons. The object of s 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 is the protection of the attaching creditor against a transfer made during the attachment.<sup>92</sup> The Supreme Court disagreeing with the view taken in Mohinder Singh's case has now held that the agreement for sale creates an obligation attached to the ownership of property, and since the attaching creditor is entitled to attach only the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor, the attachment cannot be free from obligations incurred under the contract for sale. The right of the attaching creditor shall not be allowed to override the contractual obligation arising from an antecedent agreement for sale of the attached property.<sup>93</sup>

In a later decision without expressing any opinion with regard to the case of an agreement for sale, the Supreme Court opined that a sale deed having been executed prior to attachment before judgment, though registered subsequently, will prevail over attachment before judgment.<sup>94</sup>

(10) Pre-emption

The nature of a covenant for pre-emption under the TP Act has been considered in the commentary on s 14.<sup>95</sup> It was submitted in earlier editions to this work that such a covenant was a personal covenant not creating any interest in property, and that certain decisions to the contrary were incorrect. It is unnecessary to further consider this question as the Supreme Court has clearly upheld the view expressed in earlier editions of this work, and held that such a covenant was a personal covenant.<sup>96</sup> As a personal contract it is binding on the parties thereto and their personal representatives, and it creates an obligation arising out of the contract and is binding on a purchaser for value with notice, and on a gratuitous transferee under the second part of this section.<sup>97</sup> The benefit of the covenant cannot, however, be transferred as it is restricted in enjoyment to the covenantee.<sup>98</sup>

(11) Notice

Notice of the contractual obligation may be constructive notice.<sup>99</sup> Thus, it is sufficient notice if the contract is entered in the wajib-ul-ars of the village,<sup>1</sup> or the contract was for sale to a mortgagee who is in possession.<sup>2</sup> In a small village, when any transaction takes place, it becomes common knowledge. A subsequent purchaser of land were deemed to have knowledge of an earlier sale agreement when all the parties belonged to the same village.<sup>3</sup>

(12) Court Sale

A purchaser at a court sale is a transferee by operation of law, and is, therefore, not a transferee within the meaning of this section. It has been suggested that the principle of the second para of this section might apply to him.<sup>4</sup> The point was raised before the Privy Council, but was not actually decided as the purchaser had not an unequivocal notice of the contract. Lord Dunedin, however, observed that 'judicial sales would be robbed of all their sanctity if vague references to antecedent contracts could be held to invalidate the buyer's title.'<sup>5</sup> In an Allahabad case, it was assumed that the Official Receiver in whom the property had vested by operation of law was a transferee under this section.<sup>6</sup>

Transfer by ostensible owner

--Where, with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in immovable property, a person is the ostensible owner of such property and transfers the same for consideration, the transfer shall not be voidable on the ground that the transferor was not authorised to make it: provided that the transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith.

(1) Principle

The foundation of the section is the following well-known passage from the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Ramcoomar v Mac-queen:<sup>7</sup>

It is a principle of natural equity which must be universally applicable that, where one man allows another to hold himself out as the owner of an estate and a third person purchases it, for value, from the apparent owner in the belief that he is the real owner, the man who so allows the other to hold himself out shall not be permitted to recover upon his secret title, unless he can overthrow that of the purchaser by showing either that he had direct notice, or something which amounts to constructive notice, of the real title; or that there existed circumstances which ought to have put him upon an enquiry that, if prosecuted, would have led to a discovery of it.

The section is a statutory application of the law of estoppel,<sup>8</sup> the general principle of which is thus stated by the House of Lords in Cairncross v Lorimer:<sup>9</sup> if a man, either by words or by conduct, has initiated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they might have abstained--he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned--to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct.

The law of estoppel is enacted in s 115 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 and Shepherd and Brown point out that the leading case on that sanction fails equally under s 41 of the TP Act. In that case,<sup>10</sup> the owner transferred property to his wife as benamidar and after his death she mortgaged the property, her son assisting in the transaction and receiving the mortgage money. The son was held to be estopped from disputing the mortgage, while if this section had been applied, the case would have been decided on the ground that by the consent of the son, the mother was the ostensible owner.

The transferee will be protected only if he has acted in good faith after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor has power to make the transfer. The transferee who willfully shuts his eyes and takes the transfer without any inquiry is not protected. The transferee is also required to show that he had purchased the property after taking care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer. What is reasonable care depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and no hard and fast rules can be laid down.<sup>11</sup>

The principle of this section applies to the territory of Delhi.<sup>12</sup> The section makes an exception to the rule that a person cannot confer a better title than he has.<sup>13</sup>

(2) Court Sale

The section applies only to voluntary transfers, and has no application to court sales.<sup>14</sup> The provisions of ss 41 and 43 logically get engaged in voluntary transfers, and not in involuntary transfers like auction sales.<sup>15</sup>

(3) Requirements of the Section

The following conditions are necessary for the application of the section,<sup>16</sup> namely:

- (1) the transferor is the ostensible owner;
- (2) he is so by the consent, express or implied, of the real owner;<sup>17</sup>
- (3) the transfer is for consideration;
- (4) the transferee has acted in good faith, taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to transfer.<sup>18</sup>

If any one of these elements is wanting, the transferee is not entitled to the benefit of the section.<sup>19</sup> The basis of the rule is some representation or act or conduct on the part of the true owner.<sup>20</sup> The question whether the section applies to a given set of facts is a question of law.<sup>21</sup> This is on the principle that 'the proper legal effect of a proved fact is necessarily a question of law'.<sup>22</sup>

In order to obtain the benefit of this section, the transferee must plead it and set out the relevant facts in his pleading.<sup>23</sup> An alienee from an ostensible owner is protected under s 41, if the alienee can establish that the sale was with the consent, express or implied, of the true owner, and that it was for consideration, and that the alienee had taken reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had the power to make the transfer and had acted in good faith.<sup>24</sup>

(4) Ostensible Owner

An ostensible owner is one who has all the indicia of ownership without being the real owner.<sup>25</sup> It must be shown that with the consent of the true owner, the ostensible owner was able to represent himself as the owner of the property to the purchaser for value without notice.<sup>26</sup> It has been held that the possession of a manager cannot be treated as ostensible ownership with the consent of the real owner;<sup>27</sup> and this was held to be so even in a case where the manager's name had been entered in the Municipal House Register as the real owner.<sup>28</sup> A professed agent or manager cannot of course be an ostensible owner,<sup>29</sup> nor can the occupation of a menial servant constitute ostensible ownership.<sup>30</sup> But s 41 would apply where the plaintiff allowed his mother to act as manager with the right to alienate for necessity.<sup>31</sup> If the property vests in an idol, it would not be possible to hold that this trustee or the manager of the idol can set himself up as the owner of the property.<sup>32</sup> A co-sharer in occupation of a joint family residential property cannot be held to be an ostensible owner.<sup>33</sup> The conduct of co-sharers in permitting one of them to manage the common property does not by itself raise any estoppel precluding them from asserting their rights.<sup>34</sup>

It has been held that a mortgagor is the owner of a limited interest, and not an ostensible owner and, therefore, the purchaser of an equity of redemption is not entitled to the protection of this section against the mortgagee.<sup>35</sup> This is correct, but the transferee may, it is submitted, in an appropriate case, claim the benefit of the principle behind the section, if he has been led by the conduct of the mortgagee to believe that the property was unencumbered.

A donor who has not reserved to himself any power of revocation of the deed of gift cannot be regarded as an ostensible owner even if the deed of gift has been in his possession.<sup>36</sup>

A Mahomedan son and daughter inherited property, but as the son remained in possession of his sister's share as well as his own for 25 years, had all the property entered in the revenue papers in his sole name, and alone executed mortgages of the whole property, he was treated as ostensible owner of his sister's share.<sup>37</sup> So also, when the other heirs of a Mahomedan, who lived in another village, left the widow in sole possession and allowed her to deal with it as if she was solely entitled.<sup>38</sup> Again, a widow, who had a half share in a house and allowed her husband's cousin to deal with it as if it were his own, was estopped as she had held him out as ostensible owner.<sup>39</sup> On the other hand, the manager of a Hindu family who has the power to alienate family property only in case of necessity or for the benefit of the estate, cannot be treated as an ostensible owner.<sup>40</sup> A vendor coparcener in occupation of portion of ancestral property, does not become 'ostensible owner'.<sup>41</sup> Where the transferor and the transferee are closely related as uncle and nephew, the transferee is expected to know the real nature of the transaction, and cannot claim the protection of the section.<sup>42</sup> Nor can a transferee from a Hindu widow claim the protection of s 41, for a Hindu widow holds in her own right, and not as ostensible owner.<sup>43</sup>

A benamidar is an ostensible owner, and if a person purchases from a benamidar, the real owner cannot recover, unless he shows that the purchaser had actual or constructive notice of the real title.<sup>44</sup> A benami transaction in a sense is not a sham transaction. The essence of a benami transfer is to give it the appearance of reality, to cloak a fictitious transfer with all the appearance of a genuine one.<sup>45</sup>

The benamidar before the enactment of Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act 1988, could not have any right title or interest in the property which the benamidar could convey. A mere declaration by such benamidar in a release deed that he has no right or interest in the property and that he was a mere benamidar of the releasee, could not operate as a conveyance.<sup>46</sup>

Principles for determining whether transfer is benami are as under:<sup>47</sup>

- (1) The burden of showing that a transfer is a benami transaction lies on the person who asserts that it is such a transaction;
- (2) if it is proved that the purchase money came from a person other than the person in whose favour the property is transferred, the purchase is prima facie assumed to be for the benefit of the person who supplied the purchase money, unless there is evidence to the contrary;
- (3) the true character of the transaction is governed by the intention of the person who has contributed the purchase money; and
- (4) the question as to what his intention was has to be decided on the basis of the surrounding circumstances, the relationship of the parties, the motive governing their action in bringing about the transaction and their subsequent conduct etc.

In benami transactions, the points to be considered are the motive for the transaction, the custody of the title deeds, the payment of considerations and actual possession of the property in dispute. If, there is a plausible explanation as to why the documents are taken in the name of the other party, and if a person setting out a benami theory is in possession of title deeds, he is in possession of the property, and has made payment of consideration then undoubtedly, it is a benami transaction.<sup>48</sup>

The Gujarat High Court<sup>49</sup> relying upon the decision of the apex court in Bhim Singh v Kan Singh held that by making internal arrangements and getting the sale deed executed in favor of the defendant, there was no intention of either of the parties to have benami transactions, or that the defendant should not have any beneficial interest in the property. For almost 18 years, there was no thought of benami transaction, and it is only at the time of filing of the suit that there was a legal brainwave, and an idea was struck for invoking the benami element. There is no substance in this contention.

(5) Application to Mortgages

The principle of the section is not restricted to conveyances, and also applies to mortgages. A mortgagee from an ostensible owner acting in good faith and with reasonable care has frequently been allowed the benefit of the section.<sup>50</sup>

In the undernoted case;<sup>51</sup> there was a difference of opinion as to whether an ostensible mortgagee could be treated as an ostensible owner. It is submitted that he is the ostensible owner of the mortgagee's interest. If a purchaser for consideration of that interest, who had acted in good faith and with reasonable care, sought to enforce the mortgage, it seems clear that the mortgagor, who had created that interest, would be estopped.

Illustration

A is induced by B to make a colourable conveyance of her house to her granddaughter C who is B's wife. C makes a colourable conveyance to D who is B's brother, 10 years later, D makes a colourable conveyance to B. The names of C and then of D have been registered as owners and B who is in possession, mortgages the house to E. E accepts the mortgage after enquiry with reasonable care, in good faith believing B to be the owner. E obtains a decree for sale of the mortgage and purchases the house. A is barred by s 41 from setting up her title to the house.

(6) Consent

The real owner is not responsible, unless the apparent ownership of the transferor has been permitted or created by him. He creates or permits the appearance of ownership either by express words of consent, or by acts or conduct which imply consent. It is not necessary that he should have been influenced by a fraudulent intention, for his liability rests upon his having put the transferor in a position which enabled him to commit a fraud. This is on the principle that 'when one of two innocent persons must suffer from the fraud of a third, he shall suffer who, by his indiscretion, has enabled such third person to commit the fraud'.<sup>52</sup> The same principle was stated in somewhat wider terms by J Ashurst in Lickbarrow v Mason,<sup>53</sup> that wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

- (1) Land belonged to the panchayat samiti. Transferee, after taking land on lease from the panchayat samiti, filed an application for its allotment treating it to be in ownership of the state government. Land was transferred by sale in favour of the transferee. The Supreme Court held that such sale cannot be sustained on the plea of protection under s 41 since there is nothing on record to show that the state government had transferred the land as an ostensible owner with the consent, express or implied, of the panchayat samiti in favour of the state government.<sup>54</sup>

- (2) A husband entered his land in the revenue records in his wife's name and went away on a pilgrimage. Before his departure he had allowed her to mortgage the land. After his departure, she sold the land and the vendee paid off the mortgage. The husband on his return could neither recover the land nor redeem the mortgage.<sup>55</sup>
- (3) A, a Hindu husband, purchased land in the name of his wife, B. The land was then entered in B's name in the revenue records. After A's death B, the widow, mortgaged the land to C who took the mortgage after due enquiry believing in good faith that B was the owner. C obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage and purchased the land. But D was then in possession for D had purchased the land in execution of a money decree against A. C's suit against D for possession was decreed. D was the successor in interest of A who had held out his wife as the ostensible owner and could not defeat the mortgagee who was a transferee in good faith from the ostensible owner.<sup>56</sup>
- (4) A, a Hindu, dies leaving a daughter B who takes a limited estate by inheritance, B makes a statement to the revenue authorities that A's separated brother C is his heir, and allows C to take possession of the estate. On B's death, her son claims to succeed as reversionary heir of A. C is not entitled to the protection of s 41, for his ostensible ownership has not been created by the real owner M, but by the limited owner B.<sup>57</sup>

The consent must be a free consent as defined in s 14 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and it has been held that it must be an intelligent consent, and not one brought about by a misapprehension of legal rights.<sup>58</sup> However, a consent based on a mistake of fact had been held to be within the section.<sup>59</sup> Where alienation is made by an ostensible owner of property belonging to the true owner who is a minor, s 41 does not apply. It is impossible for the minor to give his assent, either expressly, or by implication to a transfer. Only those donees from an ostensible owner are protected, who can establish that the sale in their favour was with the consent, express or implied, of the true owner-- and that too, only on proving that it was for consideration, and that they had taken reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had the power to make the transfer, and that they acted in good faith.

A property sold was pre-empted and the pre-emption money was paid by the pre-emptor. However, the pre-emptor did not take possession. The prior owners again sold the property to the appellants. On compulsory acquisition of the property, the compensation money was claimed by the respondent, the pre-emptor who was the real owner. The appellants claimed protection under s 41, TP Act.

It was held that the respondent was concededly minor at the time of sales in favour of the appellants. He, therefore, could not be held to have consented expressly or impliedly to the transaction.<sup>60</sup>

Section 41 does not apply to minors, and a minor's guardian who transfers the property of a minor cannot be treated as an ostensible owner with the consent of the minor,<sup>61</sup> who, by reason of the disability of infancy, cannot give his consent.<sup>62</sup> The doctrine of estoppel does not apply to minors,<sup>63</sup> and still less will the court hold an infant estopped by the acts and omissions of others.<sup>64</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) The owner, a Mohamedan, died leaving a widow and two minor sons. The widow's share was one-eighth, but she got herself registered as owner of one-third. She then mortgaged the one-third share to A. A obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage and purchased the property. A then sold to B. The sons were entitled to recover their proper share from B. A could not be ostensible owner with their consent, express or implied, because they were minors.<sup>65</sup>

- (2) A made a colourable conveyance of his patni estate to B, but retained possession of the conveyance and of the patni lease. After A's death his widow as guardian of his minor son appointed B agent to collect the rents. B sold the property to C. The son was not barred by s 41 from asserting his title against C.

This is because--

- (i) appointment as agent did not make B the ostensible owner;
- (ii) even if B was the ostensible owner he was not so with the consent, express or implied, of the son as the son was then a minor; and
- (iii) if C had taken reasonable care, he would have found that B was not in possession of the deeds of title.<sup>66</sup>

Where the widows of the sons of a deceased mortgagee accepted payment of the debt from the mortgagors and transferred the property to them, the real heirs were not bound, for although the widow's names were entered in the revenue records, they had not consented to the transfer.<sup>67</sup>

(7) Implied Consent

Implied consent is consent evidenced by conduct. Thus, if the real owner knows that another person is dealing with his property as if it were his own, and acquiesces, his inaction will imply consent.<sup>68</sup> However, consent must be to ostensible ownership, there is no such consent where co-sharers left the management of the property to one of them, whose name was also shown in the revenue records as owner, as the least inquiry would have disclosed the true facts.<sup>69</sup> In a case where the purchaser of a tenure allowed his vendor to represent himself to be still the tenant and to continue to pay the rent of the landlord, the purchaser was bound by a decree for sale in execution of a decree for rent against the vendor.<sup>70</sup> But in a similar case where the vendor paid rent because the landlord refused to receive the rent from the purchaser, J Mukerji held that there is no acquiescence, and that the purchaser was not bound by the landlord's decree.<sup>71</sup> These cases were decided on the principle to s 41 for the transfer was involuntary, and by operation of the law. But silence will not work an estoppel, unless it is such as to induce a belief that the party keeping silence has no rights.<sup>72</sup> When purdanashin ladies left the management of their property in the hands of male members of the family who dealt with it without their active concurrence, the Privy Council held that their conduct had not been such as to mislead the mortgagees of the property.<sup>73</sup> However, in another case where two Mahomedan sisters allowed a spendthrift brother to dissipate their share of the property, the Privy Council held that the brother was the ostensible owner with the implied consent of the sisters, and this was because both the sisters had husbands who understood business.<sup>74</sup> The inaction or silence of a real owner at a time when he was not conscious of his own rights would not debar him from urging his own claim against a transferor even if he is one for consideration. It is essential that a person giving consent must be aware of his right.<sup>75</sup> It has been held in some cases<sup>76</sup> that silence or inactivity can never amount to implied consent, even where the real owner is aware of his rights and of the transfer. This seems doubtful, for considerations of equity would require that a party keeping silent ought to be estopped if such silence induces a belief that he has no rights in the property.<sup>77</sup> When the real owner, by his conduct, allowed the world at large to believe that he has no right in the property, and infact was not in possession of the property and transactions reflected in the revenue record and in the registered documents fully supported the ostensible title and the possession of the ostensible owner, the purchasers under such circumstances are entitled to protection under s 41.<sup>78</sup>

A mortgage contained so inaccurate a description of the property that a purchaser from the mortgagor did not discover the mortgage on a search of the register. This inaccuracy was held to be due to gross negligence on the part of the mortgagee, which enabled the mortgagor to hold himself out as ostensible owner so that the purchaser acquired a title free from the mortgage.<sup>79</sup> But in a similar case, it was doubted whether such negligence would amount to implied consent.<sup>80</sup>

It has been said that the words 'with the consent express or implied' govern the word 'transfers'.<sup>81</sup> This is erroneous for if the real owner consented to the transfer he would be estopped under s 115 Indian Evidence Act 1872, irrespective of this section.<sup>82</sup> Moreover, the section applies when the person, who, with the consent express or implied of the real owner, in the position of an ostensible owner, makes a transfer of which the real owner is unaware.

(8) Attestation

Attestation does not by itself imply consent.<sup>83</sup> Attestation estops a man from denying nothing whatsoever, except that he has witnessed the execution of the deed.<sup>84</sup> It may, of course, be proved that attestation took place in circumstances, which involved knowledge of, or consent to, the transaction;<sup>85</sup> and it has been said that the ordinary practice in India is to require attestation in token of consent.<sup>86</sup> But this practice has been condemned by the Privy Council. Lord Buckmaster said:

If in fact there be a practice, as is suggested from the evidence, that when the consent of parties to a transaction is required, it can be obtained by inducing them by one means or another to attest a signature of the executing parties, the sooner that practice is discontinued the better it will be for the straightforward dealing essential in all business matters.<sup>87</sup>

(9) Reasonable Care

Reasonable care has been explained to mean such care as an ordinary man of business would take.<sup>88</sup> Reasonable care is to be expected from every one who claims to have purchased free from a really existing right.<sup>89</sup> Revenue records are not documents of title, and it is not safe to rely on the entry of the transferor's name in the revenue registers. A transferee who does so and omits to inquire into title is not protected by this section.<sup>90</sup> This also applies to entries in Municipal and Police registers.<sup>91</sup> Mere entrusting of an inquiry to a solicitor does not amount to reasonable care.<sup>92</sup> A discrepancy in the sale certificate between the description of the property by its name and delineation by boundaries ought to put the transferee on guard.<sup>93</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A tahsildar, being forbidden by departmental rules from acquiring land within the limits of his taluk, purchased land in the name of his minor sons and entered it in their names in the revenue records. The sons afterwards sold and mortgaged the land to a person who acted in good faith and in reliance on the entries in the revenue papers. Nevertheless, the purchasers and mortgagees were not entitled to the protection of this section, as they should not have been satisfied with entries in the revenue records.<sup>94</sup>
- (2) A is the owner of property which is entered in the revenue records in the name of B. B mortgages the property to C who accepts the mortgage relying on the revenue register. If C had made further enquiry, he would have found that A had objected to the entry of the property in B's name and that the property had been left to A by will. C is not protected by this section.<sup>95</sup>

(10) Possession and Entries in Revenue Records

It may be that on the facts of a case, it is sufficient if the purchaser ascertains that his vendor is in possession and is entered in the revenue records<sup>96</sup> (illustrations 1 and 2), but this does not dispense with the duty to make the usual inquiry into title (illustration 3).<sup>97</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) Three grandsons were heirs of one-third of an estate, but they took possession of the whole and entered the whole in their names in the revenue registers, and mortgaged the whole property to a mortgagee who took in good faith. The other heirs to one-thirds of the property were barred by s 41 from disputing the mortgage of their share.<sup>98</sup>

- (2) A assigned a lease of town land to B, but A remained in possession and the land was not transferred to the name of B in the Government register. A leased a plot of the land to C who took the lease finding A in possession and the land standing in his name. B was barred by s 41 from asserting his title against C.<sup>99</sup>
- (3) A gave a usufructuary mortgage of land to B in 1867 and B's name was erroneously entered in the revenue records as owner. B, in 1914, mortgaged the land to C, part of the mortgage money being reserved to pay off a prior sub-mortgage of 1902. A sued to redeem the mortgage of 1867. C pleaded that B was in possession, was registered as owner and represented himself to the owner and that he had not been liable on the mortgage of 1867. If C had made enquiry into title, he would have found that in the mortgage of 1902, B had described himself as mortgagee. C was not entitled to the protection of this section.<sup>1</sup>

(11) Inquiries into Title

The transferee must show that he has made the usual inquiry into title; otherwise he is not entitled to the protection of this section.<sup>2</sup> In this connection, the courts have frequently quoted a well-known passage from Lord Lindley's judgments in Bailey v Barnes :<sup>3</sup>

A purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor's title. But in dealing with real property, as in other matters of business, regard is had to the usual course of business; and a purchaser who wilfully departs from it in order to avoid acquiring a knowledge of his vendor's title is not allowed to derive any advantage from his wilful ignorance of defects which would have come to his knowledge if he had transacted his business in the ordinary way.

- (1) A and his brother B formed a joint and undivided Hindu family. A out of self-acquired funds purchased a house and took the conveyance in his own name. After A's death, his representatives sold the house to C. It appears that A had thrown the house into the common stock of the joint family, so that his representatives could only sell a half share. C claimed to have acquired title to the whole under s 41. But as he had made no enquiry into title at all, and had not even seen the main deed of title passing the property to A, he was not entitled to the protection of this section.<sup>4</sup>
- (2) Sakina owned a house in Cawnpore. In 1912 she went on a pilgrimage to Mecca leaving the house in charge, to a relation Badullah. In 1915, Badullah applied to the Municipality that he was not aware of Sakina's whereabouts and nor whether she was dead or alive, and prayed that the house was entered in his name as he was her heir. The application was granted and two years later Badullah sold the house to the defendant who purchased in good faith after inspecting the Municipal register. Sakina returned to Cawnpore in 1918 and claimed the house. The defendant was not entitled to the protection of s 41 for he knew that Sakina was the original owner, and if he had carried his enquiries further, he would have ascertained that Badullah had admitted in his application to the Municipality that he did not know whether Sakina was dead or alive and the presumption of death could not be made before the lapse of seven years.<sup>5</sup>
- (3) *The male member of a Mahomedan family, which had adopted the Hindu religion in matters of worship, mortgaged family property without consulting the female members of the family. The mortgagee, a pleader, was under the impression that the parties were governed by Hindu law and that the females had no proprietary interest. The males had on previous occasions dealt with the property without the concurrences of the females. Nevertheless, as the mortgagee made no enquiry of the females or of their husbands and as the former were purdanisheen ladies who usually leave the management of property in* - the hands of male relations, the mortgage was not protected by s 41.<sup>6</sup>

- (4) Where vendor, being a member of the Scheduled Caste, had no right to alienate the land for a period of twenty years in view of Rule 6(8) of the Punjab Package Deal Properties (Disposal) Rules, 1976, it was held that the purchaser is not entitled to the protection of s 41 since had he made a reasonable enquiry, he could have ascertained the bar created by Rule 6(8) and also would have found out the red ink entry in the jamabandi, which clearly indicated that the land in dispute could not be sole for twenty years.<sup>7</sup>

The title may be so clear that no particular inquiry is called for. In an Allahabad case,<sup>8</sup> CJ Stanley said:

We think that where a person is found in possession of property, and is recorded as owner, and holds the title deeds of the property and deals with a third party in respect of it, there is nothing to suggest a want of good faith in such third party in dealing with him in respect of the property.

However, there may be circumstances which demand further inquiry; and as to these it is not sufficient to assert generally that inquiries should have been made, or that a prudent man would have made inquiry, but some specific circumstances should be pointed out as a starting point of an inquiry, which would have led to some result.<sup>9</sup> The transferee cannot be held to have acted without reasonable care if there was no clue existing to suggest that the transferor was not the real owner.<sup>10</sup> It is always necessary to make a particular inquiry if the transferor is the karta of a joint family,<sup>11</sup> or if the land is in possession of a person other than the transferor.<sup>12</sup> A person who takes a mortgage from one whom he knows to be the sister's son or grandson of the original owner ought to inquire if there are any collaterals in existence.<sup>13</sup> When oral transfers were permitted by law in the state of Punjab, inspection of records in the registration office was not sine qua non while granting protection to the alienee under s 41 of the TP Act.<sup>14</sup>

(12) Property Belonging to Women

Where the real owner is a woman who has allowed her male relations to deal with her property or her share of the property, her right may be defeated by the operation of this section, if the transferee has acted bona fide, and has taken reasonable care to investigate title. Such cases turn on their own facts. In Azima Bibi v Shamalanand,<sup>15</sup> a case already referred to, the Privy Council held that purdanashin ladies who had left the management of their property to their male relations were not bound by a mortgage of family property executed by them alone. In an Allahabad case,<sup>16</sup> J Mukerji observed that in Mahomedan families, the names of female heirs are never entered in the revenue records and that:

If we are to say that Mahomedan sons, simply because their names alone are down in the khewat, are entitled to give a good title to a transferee, and the mother and the sisters shall be precluded from claiming their shares, it would be disastrous indeed.

Similarly, in a Nagpur case,<sup>17</sup> two Mahomedan brothers and a sister inherited property, and the sister allowed it to be entered in the revenue in the names of the brothers who sold it without consulting the sister; but the court said that 'the facts that the transferors were Mahomedans ought to have put the present defendant and his predecessors in interest on enquiry as to whether there was a female heir in addition to the two transferors.' In Zarif-un-nisa v Shafiq-uz-zaman Khan,<sup>18</sup> the Privy Council held that the Mahomedan sisters who left their share of inherited property in the hands of a spendthrift brother were barred by the section as they had husbands who understood business. However, in Mubarakunissa v Muhammad Raza,<sup>19</sup> the property of a deceased Mahomedan was inherited by three grandsons and two daughters. The grandsons took possession of the whole property, entered it in their own names in the register, and two years later mortgaged it. The daughters first heard of the mortgage when the mortgagee brought the property to sale, and although it does not appear that they had husbands to protect their interests, their claim was held barred by s 41. In Macneill & Co v Saroda Sundari,<sup>20</sup> two Hindu brothers managed the property in which their mother had a third share, and the mother's share was held bound by a permanent lease which they had granted without reference to her. The court distinguished the Privy Council case of Azima Bibi v Shamalanand<sup>21</sup> on the ground that Hindu women do not as a rule succeed to property by inheritance.

(13) Good Faith

These words mean that the transferee had acted honestly, and in the real belief that the ostensible owner is the real owner. Reasonable care is not enough if there is absence of good faith. A person may act without negligence, but at the same time without honesty. A purchaser may have made a reasonably careful inquiry, but if, after ascertaining the true facts, he chooses to ignore them, he is not protected.<sup>22</sup> But when a man purchased a possessory title believing in good faith that his vendor was the real owner, and any inquiry that he could have made would only have confirmed him in that belief, the court held he was protected by this section.<sup>23</sup> The court is slow to believe in the good faith of a transferee who lives in the same village as the real owner, and is acquainted with all the circumstances of his family.<sup>24</sup> Knowledge of the infirmity of the title of the transferor, deprives the transferee of the protection of this section.<sup>25</sup> Mere misconception of the rights of the transferor will not avail. So, when a person bought property belonging to a female, who had been outcasted for unchastity, believing that her interest was forfeited, he was not protected by this section.<sup>26</sup> So also, mere good faith is not sufficient. The purchaser must establish that he made reasonable inquiries.<sup>27</sup> In a Punjab case, the allotment of land to a person (who had migrated from Pakistan to India) in lieu of the land owned in Pakistan, was cancelled by the rehabilitation authorities. Thereafter, the allottee took the land on lease from the rehabilitation authorities and started paying the lease money to them. The land was later auctioned and purchased by the defendants. On application by the allottee, the land was re-auctioned and at the time of re-auction, the allottee competed in the bid with the defendants. When he was unsuccessful in outbidding the defendants, he filed the suit challenging the order cancelling his allotment. However, he had not appealed against the order cancelling the allotment. It was held that the defendants were entitled to the benefit of s 41, and to the principle of estoppel. The conduct of the plaintiff was such that the defendants were led to a belief that the plaintiff consented to the sale of the property, and the purchasers acted in good faith in purchasing it at the time of auction. The plaintiff's participation in the auction, and earlier payment of lease money to the rehabilitation authorities, made defendants believe that no dispute had been left between the plaintiff and the rehabilitation authorities. That conduct of the plaintiff was such that a purchaser at the time of auction could take it in good faith that the plaintiff did not claim the property.<sup>28</sup> The Patna High Court has held that if the transaction is a sham one, the section cannot apply, since the transferee would then have knowledge of reality.<sup>29</sup>

Plaintiff vendor alleged that sale deed was as security for loan advanced by defendant. Plaintiff continued in possession despite the sale deed. The defendant admitted during cross-examination, that on many occasions he has entered into a sale transaction of the land to keep it as security. Therefore, it was held that sale deed was security for loan advanced, and not an outright sale.<sup>30</sup>

(14) Partial Interest

The section also applies to cases where the transferor has actually some interest and the appearance of an interest greater than he really has. In one case, the plaintiff granted a mortgage by conditional sale by two contemporaneous deeds, one a sale and the other an agreement of reconveyance. The plaintiff retained the agreement of reconveyance, and the mortgagee who was in possession sold the land after the lapse of 42 years to the defendant, who on inspection of the sale deed believed the mortgagee to be a vendee. The plaintiff sued to redeem the defendant, but s 41 was held to bar the suit.<sup>31</sup> It may be observed, in passing, that such a case could not occur since the amendment of s 58(c) which requires a condition of reconveyance in a mortgage to be engrossed in the same deed. Cases in which the transferor is a mortgagor or one of several heirs have already been cited.

The section is an exception to the general rule that no person can dispose of an interest in property that is not vested in him and, therefore, the onus is, in the first place, on the transferee to show that the transferor was the ostensible owner, and that he (the transferee) had acted in good faith, and with reasonable care.<sup>32</sup> The person who alleges that the property conveyed to another really belongs to him must prove his allegation.<sup>33</sup>

This burden of proving a transaction to be a benami one is on the person who alleges the same to be benami, because the apparent state of affairs must be taken to be real, unless the contrary is proved. The burden, however, does not continuously rest in one place, but may shift to the other side. Although the onus of establishing that a transaction is 'benami' is on the person asserting it to be so, yet where it is not possible to obtain evidence which conclusively establishes or rebuts the allegation, the case must be dealt with on reasonable probabilities and legal inferences arising from proved or admitted facts.<sup>34</sup> The burden of proving that a transaction is benami is on the person so asserting. The decision must be based on legal grounds, and not mere suspicion.<sup>35</sup>

The onus is then shifted on the party seeking to defeat the transferee's title to show that there was something to call attention and invoke inquiry. This is because the real owner having created the appearance of title in another person, it is incumbent on him, or on those who derive title from him to show something which amounts to constructive notice of the real title, some specific circumstance as the starting point of an inquiry which would have led to the discovery of it.<sup>36</sup> The same rule was applied in a case where the ostensible owner had a lien on the property.<sup>37</sup> In a suit for declaration of title to the suit property on a plea that the defendant was a benamidar of the plaintiff, the initial burden is on the plaintiff to prove the benami nature of the transaction.<sup>38</sup>

If notice by the purchaser is pleaded by the real owner, the burden is on him (the real owner) to prove such notice. He must show that the purchaser had direct notice, or something which amounts to constructive notice of the real title, or that there existed circumstances which ought to have put the purchaser on an inquiry which, if prosecuted properly, could have led to discovery of the real title.<sup>39</sup>

To substantiate a case of benami, several factors have to be taken into consideration by the court. The relevant factors are:

- (a) the consideration;
- (b) possession and enjoyment of the property;
- (c) possession of the title deeds;
- (d) motive, and
- (e) mutation in the public records.

Further, if the benamidar and the real owner were related as wife and husband, the payment of consideration may not be decisive, for, it is most likely that the husband intended to benefit the wife.<sup>40</sup>

(16) Subsequent Transferee

The section is not limited to the immediate purchaser from an ostensible owner, but extends to subsequent purchasers also. Even if the immediate purchaser had notice, yet the ultimate purchaser, if he purchases bona fide and with reasonable care, is protected.<sup>41</sup> A is the real owner of property and leaves it in the possession of B as ostensible owner. B sells it to C, who has constructive notice of A's title. C then sells it to D, who is not aware of the fact which gave C constructive notice. D buys from C in good faith and after inquiry with reasonable care, D is entitled to the protection of the section.

(17) Section 52 Excludes Section 41

In a case decided by Allahabad High Court the property was in the possession of three illegitimate sons whose names were entered in the revenue records. The rightful heir filed a suit to recover possession and obtained a decree. But a few days after he filed the suit, the illegitimate sons mortgaged the property, and the mortgagee, relying on their ostensible ownership, claimed that the rightful heir was bound by the mortgage. The mortgagors whose names were entered in the revenue records and who were in possession were no doubt ostensible owners; but as the real owners had filed a suit against them, it is clear that they were not, on the date on which the mortgage was made, ostensible owners with their consent, express or implied. The doctrine of lis pendens under s 52, therefore, excludes the doctrine of ostensible ownership under this section.<sup>42</sup>

(18) Registration Act 1908

Section 41 should not be read so as to conflict with s 47 of the Registration Act 1908. A sells his property to B, and before the sale deed is registered sells it again by a registered sale deed to C. B's sale deed, though registered later, has priority. C cannot claim that A was the ostensible owner with the consent of B so as to bar B's claim under s 41.<sup>43</sup>

(19) Code of Civil Procedure 1908

A transferee from a certified purchaser at a court sale is, by virtue of s 66 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, protected from a suit on the ground that his transferor was a benamidar.<sup>44</sup>

(20) Reliance on Recitals

The inaccuracy in the recitals describing the property cannot whittle down the effect of clear recitals in the documents about the property to be sold thereby.<sup>45</sup>

(21) Prohibition of Benami Transactions

The Parliament has enacted the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act 1988 prohibiting benami transactions under s 3(1), and making them punishable under s 3(3). The prohibition does not, however, apply to the purchase of property by any person in the name of his wife or unmarried daughters and it shall be presumed, unless the contrary is proved, that the said property had been purchased for the benefit of the wife or the unmarried daughters. Benami transaction is defined under s 2(1) so as to mean any transaction in which property is transferred to one person for consideration paid or provided by another person. Nothing in the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act shall affect the provisions of s 53 of the TP Act as laid down in s 6. The Supreme Court has held that the Benami Transaction (Prohibition) Act is a piece of prohibitory legislation, and it prohibits benami transactions subject to stated exceptions and makes such transactions punishable, and also prohibits the right to defences against recovery of benami transactions as defined in s 2(a) of that Act.<sup>46</sup>

Transfer by person having authority to revoke former transfer

--Where a person transfers any immovable property, reserving power to revoke the transfer, and subsequently transfers the property for consideration to another transferee, such transfer operates in favour of such transferee (subject to any condition attached to the exercise of the power) as a revocation of the former transfer to the extent of the power.

Illustration

A lets a house to B, and reserves power to revoke the lease if, in the opinion of a specified surveyor, B should make a use of it detrimental to its value. Afterwards A, thinking that such a use has been made, lets the house to C. This operates as a revocation of B's lease subject to the opinion of the surveyor as to B's use of the house having been detrimental to its value.

(1) Principle

The principle of the section is that if a person has a right to transfer property, after exercising a right to revoke a previous transfer, a transfer of such property by him will imply an exercise of the right of revocation. The illustration shows that if the power of revocation is subject to a condition, the transfer is subject to the same condition.<sup>47</sup>

If the first transfer is a gift and is revocable at the will of the donor, it is void under s 126 of TP Act.

47 See in this connection Judah v Abdool (1874) 22 WR 60.

Transfer by unauthorised person who subsequently acquires interest in property transferred

--Where a person fraudulently or erroneously represents that he is authorised to transfer certain immovable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall, at the option of the transferee, operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists.

Nothing in this section shall impair the right of transferees in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the said option.

Illustration

A, a Hindu, who has separated from his father B, sells to C three fields, X, Y and Z, representing that A is authorised to transfer the same. Of these fields Z does not belong to A, it having been retained by B on the partition; but on B's dying A as heir, obtains Z. C, not having rescinded the contract of sale, may require A to deliver Z to him.

(1) Amendment

The words 'fraudulently or' were inserted by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) Scope

The Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid Mercara v Kodimaniandra Deviah<sup>48</sup> has held that s 43 embodies a rule of estoppel, and enacts that a person who makes a representation shall not be heard to allege the contrary as against a person who acts on such representation. It is immaterial whether the transferor acts bona fide or fraudulently in making the representation. It is only material to find out whether in fact the transferee has been misled, where the transferee knows as a fact that the transferor does not possess the title which he represents he has, then he cannot be said to have acted on it when taking a transfer. Section 43 would then have no application, and the transfer will fail.

(3) Feeding the Estoppel and the English Law

By the English law of estoppel, 'where a grantor has purported to grant an interest in land which he did not at the time possess, but subsequently acquires, the benefit of his subsequent acquisition, goes automatically to the earlier grantee, or as it is usually expressed, feeds the estoppel'.<sup>49</sup> The principle is based partly on the common law doctrine of estoppel by deed, and partly on the equitable doctrine that a man who has promised more than he can perform must make good his contract when he acquires the power of performance.

Under the common law doctrine, if a man sells property which does not belong to him and afterwards acquires such title as enables him either wholly or partially to perform his contract, he is bound to do so; and the subsequently acquired estate feeds the estoppel which arises out of the vendor's covenants for title, express or implied. In Tilakdhari Lal v Khedan Lal,<sup>50</sup> Lord Buckmaster stated the rule of estoppel by deed as follows--

If a man who has no title whatever to property grants it by a conveyance which in form would carry the legal estate, and he subsequently acquires an interest sufficient to satisfy the grant, the estate, instantly passes.

The words 'the estate instantly passes' are important, for under the common law rule the estate passed without any further act of the transferor, and the estoppel prevailed even against a purchaser for value. The application of the common law rule is complicated by many curious technicalities,<sup>51</sup> and it is fortunate that it does not apply in India.<sup>52</sup>

The law of estoppel in the case of real property is different from the law of estoppel as between persons. It is the law which operates where a grantee of land has had a conveyance of the whole interest in land from a grantor who himself at that time had only a partial interest. The former then has a right when the grantor gets the entire interest in the land, to say as against all the world that, that interest had passed to him. It does not then depend upon the mere representation by the grantor that he had the whole interest. The estate feeds the estoppel and, therefore, becomes an interest. From the moment, therefore, the transfer commences to operate on the interest acquired by the transferor in the property, it is no longer in the region of estoppel, but becomes an interest and the commencement of that interest is from the date when the transferor had acquired interest in the property.<sup>53</sup>

(4) Indian Law and the Specific Relief Act

The equitable doctrine is an application of the equity enunciated in Holroyd v Marshall,<sup>54</sup> Collyer v Issacs,<sup>55</sup> and Tailby v Official Receiver,<sup>56</sup> and which regards that as done, which ought to be done. Under the English equity, as soon as the property is afterwards acquired, an equitable estate in it passes to the transferee. Under the Indian system, as soon as the property is afterwards acquired, no estate passes (s 54), but an obligation is annexed to the property (s 40), and the transferor becomes trustee of it for the transferee. This equitable rule is enacted in s 13(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act 1963, which is as follows:

Where a person contracts to sell or lets certain immovable property having no title or only an imperfect title, the purchaser or lessee (subject to the other provisions of this Chapter), has the following rights, namely: if the vendor or lessor has subsequently to the contract acquired any interest in the property, the purchaser or lessee may compel him to make good the contract out of such interest.

Section 43 follows the common law rule of estoppel by deed, in that the subsequent estate passes to the transferee without any further act of the transferor. The rule is that if a man, who has no title whatever to the property, grants it by a conveyance which in form carries the legal estate, and he subsequently acquires an interest sufficient to satisfy the grant, the estate instantly passes. Thus, where a person having a partial interest in certain property passes a larger interest, and subsequently acquires that interest, the section applies and the transferee is entitled to the interest acquired by the transferor.<sup>57</sup> Where a person having no title represents that he has a present and transferable title and the transferee (acting on it) takes a transfer, and the transferor subsequently acquires the property, the section applies.<sup>58</sup> However, it departs from the common law rule in two respects. For (1) the estate does not pass instantly, but only at the option of the transferee; and (2) the transferee may be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice.

Section 43 follows the equitable rule in that, until the option is exercised, it treats the transferee as the beneficiary of a trust who may be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice. However, it departs from the equitable rule in that it does not require the transfer to be effected by a further conveyance. The word 'deliver' in the illustration is significant of the meaning of the section. If the transferee were enforcing the contract under s 13(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act 1963, the transferor would be required to execute a further conveyance. But under s 43 the exercise of the option, or the mere requisition of the transferee is sufficient to bring the subsequent interest within the scope of the original transfer. The section is a species of estoppel, and cannot be availed of by a person who knowing the facts was not misled. Questions of knowledge and belief are material and the other side must be given a chance of raising its defence, if and when the section is pleaded.<sup>59</sup>

Comparison between (13)(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act 1963--then s 18(a) of the old Act-- and s 43, has been shown in Silla Chandra Sekharam v Ramchandra Sahu.<sup>60</sup>

(5) Sections 41 and 43 Compared

There is a substantial difference between the ambitions of ss 41 and 43. Section 41 provides that a transfer by an ostensible owner cannot be avoided on the ground that the transferor was not authorised to make it, and the rule is made subject to an express provision that the transferee should take reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, and to act in good faith before he can claim its benefit. On the other hand, s 43 enables a transferee to whom a transferor has made a fraudulent or erroneous representation to lay hold, at his option, of any interest which the transferor may subsequently acquire in the property, provided by doing so he does not adversely affect the right of any subsequent purchaser for value without notice.<sup>61</sup> The provisions of ss 41 and 43 logically get engaged in voluntary transfers, and not in involuntary transfers, like auction sales.<sup>62</sup>

(6) Principle Applied to Hindu Conveyances

The principle of the section has been held to apply to Hindu conveyances and to transactions before 1872, when the Indian Evidence Act enacted the equitable rule of estoppel in s 115.<sup>63</sup>

(7) Fraudulently or Erroneously Represents

The English common law doctrine of estoppel by deed was extended by equity to estoppel by representation. This extension dates from Pickard v Sears.<sup>64</sup> The rule in India is the rule as extended by equity, and it is enacted in s 115 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, and is explained in the leading case of Sarat Chunder v Gopal Chunder.<sup>65</sup> As the equitable doctrine of estoppel requires a man to make his representation good, the words 'fraudulently or erroneously represents' have been said to make estoppel the foundation of the section, and in the absence of such representation, the section does not apply.<sup>66</sup> The representation need not be intentionally false.<sup>67</sup> It requires an erroneous misrepresentation or a fraudulent representation,<sup>68</sup> and whether it is erroneous is a question of fact.<sup>69</sup> It need not be in a particular form. It can be by word of mouth or by a document.<sup>70</sup> Maps not annexed to sale deeds are not deemed to be a part of the deeds.<sup>71</sup> Where a vendor sold as agent of a Hindu widow and then became her heir, the section did not operate, for he had sold as agent and had made no erroneous representation.<sup>72</sup> However, when a Mahomedan mortgaged his wife's property purporting to act on a power of attorney which was not proved, the share which he inherited at her death was liable for the mortgage.<sup>73</sup> A ghatwal mortgaged land which he held on restricted tenure alleging it to be his jagheer, and subsequently got a mokarari lease of it. He was estopped from pleading his subsequent title, and the mortgagee got the benefit of the mokarari interest.<sup>74</sup> Two brothers mortgaged their interest in a tank in which their cousin had a half share. They subsequently acquired their cousin's share by inheritance, but the mortgagee who had got a decree for sale on his mortgage, purchased the property and sold it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not get the benefit of the cousin's share as there had been no representation, erroneous or fraudulent.<sup>75</sup> But when the head of a joint Hindu family mortgaged joint family property representing that he had a right to do so, he was bound to make good his representation to the extent of a share which came to him afterwards on partition.<sup>76</sup> Again, the father of a joint family consisting of himself and two sons sold family property representing that it was his self-acquisition. The vendee sued for possession and pending the suit one of the sons died. The vendee got the benefit of this accession to the father's estate, and was awarded half of the property.<sup>77</sup> So also, where a member of a joint Hindu family mortgaged his undivided share in the joint property in favour of another person, alleging that he was separate from the rest of the members, and thereafter there was a partition giving such member certain property, it was held that the mortgage lien would be transferred to the property which fell to such member's share.<sup>78</sup> No fraudulent or erroneous representation was found when the sale showed that transferor had 8 anna share in the land and he sold only that much.<sup>79</sup>

Illustration

A and B were two brothers and effected a partition at which the equity of redemption of a mortgage shop was allotted to A. In 1903, A had disappeared and B sold the equity of redemption to C, erroneously representing that it was ancestral property to which he was solely entitled. In 1924, C sued to redeem the mortgage of the shop and was met with the defence that he got no title from B as A was alive in 1903 and the equity of redemption belonged to him. It was proved that A died in 1914 leaving no heir except B. C was entitled to redeem as he was owner of the equity of redemption by virtue of this section.<sup>80</sup>

A lady who had already executed a settlement of the suit property in favour of V on certain conditions cancelled it (though no such power had been reserved), and executed a sale-deed in favour of G. Thereafter, the settlement lapsed because of non-fulfilment of the conditions of V. The purchaser from G filed a suit for declaration of title and possession. It was held that there was an erroneous representation by the lady to G that the lady was authorised to transfer the property. As the lady (by failure of the settlement) subsequently acquired an interest in the property, the transferee was entitled to that interest, as he had not rescinded the transfer which was still subsisting. The case squarely fell within the terms of the section.<sup>81</sup>

Where the mother sold property in which her minor son had half share and the son successfully challenged the alienation of his share and obtained a decree but died thereafter, it was held that though the mother inherited the property of her son on his death, the vendee could not invoke s 43 in respect of his share as the original contract did not subsist in view of the decree which was obtained by the son.<sup>82</sup>

Where a person mortgages property which he has no right to mortgage and the property subsequently becomes vested in him, the mortgage will operate against him under the provisions of this section.<sup>83</sup> When a lessor erroneously represents that he is authorized to lease a property and grants a lease of it, and afterwards acquires that property, the lessee is entitled to have the property from the lessor.<sup>84</sup> Where a partner sells the property of the firm in his own right and subsequently on the dissolution of the firm is allotted the same property, this section would apply.<sup>85</sup>

Where the holder of 'sir' land ('sirdar') proposes to acquire bhumidhari rights by depositing money, he does not acquire title immediately on deposit of money, but acquires it only when the bhumidhari certificate is issued. Nevertheless, if he effects the sale after such deposit, then s 43 applies, if he makes an erroneous representation that he was authorised to sell. In such a case, the transfer cannot be challenged by the son of the transferor.<sup>86</sup>

In a case where one of the daughters of the original owner was in exclusive possession of the property which she purported to transfer; the Supreme Court held that the transferee was entitled to the property under s 43, which substantially satisfies the equitable principle of feeding the grant by estoppel. The partition, between the daughters could be presumed to have been made with the consent of the other. In any case, after the death of her sister, the last limited owner, (transferor) got exclusive possession of the entire estate, and s 43 would apply.<sup>87</sup>

Where it was found that there were no fraudulent or erroneous representations and the parties were fully aware of the on-going proceeding in revenue court, merely because the land reverted to the vendor making him the owner, would not entitle the vendee, the protection of s 42.<sup>88</sup>

- (1) A Hindu wife executed a mortgage of her husband's property as if it belonged to her, five years after he had disappeared. The mortgage was invalid as the presumption of the death does not arise until seven years. But when the mortgagee filed a suit more than seven years later, the mortgage was valid, as she then had acquired a widow's estate.<sup>89</sup>
- (2) A, B and C owned a property in equal shares. A and B leased the whole property to B as if they were entitled to it to the exclusion of C. C died and bequeathed his share to A and B. D's title as lessee of the whole property was perfected.<sup>90</sup>
- (3) A obtained property from B by way of exchange. At the time of the exchange B had only a half share although he professed to transfer the whole. When B subsequently purchased the remaining half it was available to perfect A's title.<sup>91</sup>
- (4) Seller had no Bhumidhar rights on date of sale though made an erroneous statement in sale deed. After 13 years, he acquired Bhumidhar rights. It was held that such rights would enure to the transferee as sale deed remained intact for the said period.<sup>92</sup>

Transferee is not entitled to protection under s 43 when there has been no pleading that there was fraudulent or erroneous representation by transferor consequent to which no issue was framed.<sup>93</sup> One must make a specific pleading regarding fraudulent or erroneous representation made. Where the tenant knew that the person inducting him is not the landlord and hence, was never misled by any false or erroneous representation, it was held that s 43 has no application.<sup>94</sup>

(8) Transferee Acts on the Representation

The section does not expressly provide that the transferee should have been misled by the erroneous representation, for, as has been said, there is no estoppel by a false statement when the truth is known to both parties.<sup>95</sup> The right of a transferee arises from the fact that he has not got what he has paid for. If he knew that he was buying a defective title, he has paid less, and got what he bargained for.<sup>96</sup> That is also the position at common law, where it is well-settled that no estoppel can arise where the true position is apparent in the document itself.<sup>97</sup> If both parties are aware of the title of the transferor, s 43 does not apply.<sup>98</sup> A transferee is entitled to the benefit of s 43 if he believed in the representation made by the vendor and was not aware of the true interest of the vendor, with reference to the property.<sup>99</sup>

In Mulraj v Indar Singh,<sup>1</sup> it was observed that the word 'represents' used in s 43 clearly shows that the transferee must have acted on the representation, and it has been so held in numerous decisions.<sup>2</sup> It is submitted that the same conclusion can perhaps be based on the words 'fraudulently or erroneously represents'; a false statement known to be so can certainly not be fraudulent, and it is difficult to describe it even as an erroneous representation. In two cases, however, the contrary view has been taken. In Parma Nand v Champa Lal,<sup>3</sup> a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court overruled Mulraj v Indar Singh,<sup>4</sup> and Jagernath v Dhanpati,<sup>5</sup> and held that a transferee of a certain shop, who knew that the transferor was only the owner of a half-share in the shop, was entitled under s 43 to the other half-share when the transferor became entitled to it. The court held that there was nothing in s 43 which excluded its operation where the transferee was aware of the true position. A similar view has also been expressed by the Andhra Pradesh High Court.<sup>6</sup> Both these judgments held that the knowledge of the transferee is immaterial, unless it is found that the transfer was illegal or collusively entered into to defeat the provisions of law or is opposed to public policy. It is submitted, with respect, that both these judgments are erroneous. In any event, it is difficult in practice to conceive of many cases where a transferee would, with the knowledge of the true position, enter into such a transaction except to circumvent a provision of the law, or for some other purpose opposed to public policy.<sup>7</sup>

A mortgaged to B a half-share in family property in which he was entitled only to a third share. Subsequently, A's father died and A became owner of a half-share. But as B knew that A had only a third share he could only enforce his mortgage against a third share.<sup>8</sup>

Similarly, when a mortgagee of land attached to a deshgat watan knew that the mortgagor could only convey a life interest, the subsequent enlargement of the mortgagor's interest did not enure for his benefit, for he only took the estate the mortgagor was capable of conveying at the date of the mortgage.<sup>9</sup> Where evidence regarding the representation is vague and the facts are known to the purchasers, s 43 cannot apply.<sup>10</sup> Where the transferee knows as a fact that the transferor does not possess the title which he represents he has, then he cannot be said to have acted on it when taking a transfer, and in such a situation s 43 would have no application.<sup>11</sup>

It is no defence to the person estopped to plead that the transferee made no proper inquiry.<sup>12</sup>

Section 43 does not, like s 41, impose upon the transferee the duty of taking reasonable care.<sup>13</sup> No duty is cast on the vendor to make any inquiry and notice to the vendee of encumbrance does not bar the application of the section.<sup>14</sup> In Bloomenthal v Ford,<sup>15</sup> Lord Halsbury said that a person who has made a mis-statement of fact that has been acted upon has no right to say 'I told you so and so you ought not to have believed me. You were too great a fool. I had a right to mislead you because you were too great a fool.'

Illustration

A transfers property to B falsely representing that he is solely entitled to it. B believes A, but if he had made proper inquiry into the title, he would have discovered that A's cousin is owner of a share. A inherits his cousin's share. In spite of his negligence, B is entitled to the share.

(9) For Consideration

The section does not apply if the transfer is not for consideration;<sup>16</sup> it does not apply to a transaction of gift.<sup>17</sup>

(10) Invalid Transfer

In order to get the benefit of the section, two conditions which must be satisfied are-- (1) the contract of transfer was made by a person who was competent to contract; and (2) the contract would be subsisting at the time when a claim for recovery of the property is made.<sup>18</sup> The section will not apply if the transfer is invalid as being forbidden by law or contrary to public policy. This follows from the principle that there can be no estoppel against an Act of the legislature and when considerations of public interest are involved.<sup>19</sup> Thus, if a minor transfers, the section has no application.<sup>20</sup> Sale by a lunatic being void from its inception, the purchaser cannot get any relief under s 43.<sup>21</sup> So also, when the transfer required the previous permission of the Collector, and no such permission was obtained.<sup>22</sup> Where the settlement was invalid and inoperative not on account of any fraudulent or erroneous representation, but on account of the subsisting lease in respect of the land and as the landlord could not superimpose a second lease in respect of the tenanted property, it was held that no interest could be created under the subsequent document, and, therefore, there could be no question of feeding the estoppel.<sup>23</sup> In Barrow's case<sup>24</sup> VC Bacon said that:

estoppel only applies to a contract inter partes, and it is not competent to for the parties to estop themselves or anybody else in the face of an Act of Parliament.

No equities can arise out of a transaction that is forbidden on grounds of public policy.<sup>25</sup> In Annada v Gour Mohan,<sup>26</sup> J Mookerjee said that the principle of feeding the estoppel has no application when the contract of assignment refers to property which has been expressly rendered inalienable by the legislature. The interest of a Hindu reversioner is a spes successionis, and is not transferable. An agreement to transfer, or a transfer of, such an interest does not become effective when the succession opens out.<sup>27</sup> However, in two cases the Madras High Court has held that if the reversioner transfers, not his reversionary interest, but the land in praesenti as if he were absolutely entitled, s 43 will apply to validate the transfer when he succeeds to the property.<sup>28</sup> This distinction seems to have the support of the illustration to the section where A transfers field Z as to which he has only an expectancy of succession. In another case,<sup>29</sup> the Madras High Court has dissented on the ground that such a distinction would defeat the provisions of s 6(a). The Allahabad High Court, however, has followed the earlier case decided by Madras High Court holding that the illustration to s 41 is not repugnant to s 6 of the TP Act.<sup>30</sup>

The provisions of ss 6(1) and s 43 'operate on different fields, and under different conditions, and there is no ground for reading a conflict between them or for cutting down the ambit of one by reference to the other; both of them can be given full effect on their own terms, in their respective spheres.'<sup>31</sup>

A case decided by Rajasthan High Court, though it does not purport to be a case on s 41, is of interest. It holds that where a landlord is given possession by mistake of court (in disregard of a stay order staying execution of the eviction decree passed, against the tenant), the landlord's possession is illegal, and any new tenant inducted by the landlord cannot claim restitution as a bona fide transferee.<sup>32</sup>

It was held by Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid v Kodimaniandra Deviah,<sup>33</sup> affirming a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court, that the section applies to all transfers which fulfil the conditions prescribed therein, 'and it makes no difference in its application, whether the defect of title in the transferor arises by reason of his having no interest whatsoever in the property, or of his interest therein being that of an expectant heir'.<sup>34</sup> In that case, the Supreme Court held that even where a person having a mere spes successionis represents that he is the owner thereof, and transfers it to another, he is precluded from questioning the validity of the transfer, if he later on succeeds thereto, or acquires an interest therein. In Delhi Development Authority v Ravindra Mohan Aggarwal,<sup>35</sup> a plot of land within the green belt zone was auctioned. The vice-chairman of Delhi Development Authority accepted the bid. Subsequently, the zonal plan was changed, and the said plot of land was converted for residential purpose. The Supreme Court held that since the initial auction was bad in law, and since there cannot be any estoppel against statute, the subsequent conversion would not entitle the bidder, the protection of s 43.

The section does not apply to transfers forbidden by law on grounds of public policy. Thus a mortgage by a proprietor disqualified under the Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act 1882, cannot be enforced after the disqualification has been removed.<sup>36</sup> A purchaser of service inam land acquires no title after the land has been enfranchised.<sup>37</sup> The court cannot under the guise of s 43 uphold a transfer forbidden by law, but if the restriction on alienation is not an absolute restriction founded on considerations of public policy, but is only imposed by agreement, grant, or decree of court, the section will apply.<sup>38</sup>

A mortgage by a judgment debtor of property which is the subject of execution by the Collector is absolutely void, and is not effective against any residue that might be left after the Collector's regime has ended.<sup>39</sup> On the other hand, a mortgage by an undischarged insolvent becomes effective if the property reverts in the insolvent after his discharge.<sup>40</sup>

Where grant is subjected to statutory restrictions which bar alienation of the granted land, the transferee would not get a valid title to the land by invoking the doctrine of estoppel, or by virtue of s 43.<sup>41</sup>

(11) Punjab

The principle of the section has been applied to Punjab where a transfer of a spes successionis is valid (s 6(a)).

Therefore, a mortgage of property to which the mortgagor has only a reversionary interest becomes effective when the succession opens out.<sup>42</sup>

(12) Covenants for Title

In Basava Sankaran v Anjaneyulu,<sup>43</sup> an Official Receiver sold property before an order vesting it in him had been made, and the implied covenant of title was treated as an erroneous representation, and under s 43 the title of the purchaser was held to be complete when the vesting order was subsequently made. It would appear, however, that the representation under this section should be distinct from the transfer and the covenant in the transfer.

(13) When there is no Representation

As stated above, the section does not apply to cases where there has been no erroneous or fraudulent representation. But the section has its origin in two different equities, one of which does not involve misrepresentation. These are--

- (1) The equity of estoppel with regard to the passing of property whereby the transferor is estopped from saying that the after-acquired interest did not pass; and
- (2) the equity with regard to the personal obligation which compels the transferor to perform his contract when he is able to do so on the acquisition of the subsequent interest.

The first equity compels a man to make good his representation, and this comes very near the second equity which compels a man to perform according to his ability when performance becomes possible. Cases under the second equity where there is no representation may, therefore, bear a very close resemblance to cases under the section. The following are instances of the application of this second equity which is outside the rule of estoppel. In Viraya v Hanumanta,<sup>44</sup> a Hindu coparcener agreed to sell family property as if he was the owner. The purchaser sued to enforce the transfer, and pending the suit one of the two other coparceners died. The purchaser was entitled to half the property. In Goya Din v Kashi,<sup>45</sup> the plaintiff was suing for pre-emption, and in order to raise money for the litigation, in anticipation of a decree, mortgaged the suit property. After he obtained a decree and got possession, equity treating that as done which ought to be done, gave the mortgagee a charge on the property and placed him in the position of a mortgagee. In Deb Nath Moral v Sashi Bhusan Moral,<sup>46</sup> a landlord made a settlement of a non-transferable holding. The settlement was invalid at the time it was made because the raiyat had not abandoned the holding. But the subsequent abandonment of the holding by the raiyat validated the settlement. In Loot Narain v Showkie Lal,<sup>47</sup> a ghatwal mortgaged his ghatwal land by zuripeshgi lease, and shortly after the mortgage the zamindar got a decree by which the ghatwal tenure was extinguished and the mortgagee evicted. Some years later, the zamindar granted the ghatwal a permanent lease of the same land. The ghatwal was held liable to make good the zuripeshgi lease out of his new estate. In Surendra v Rajendra,<sup>48</sup> a ghatwal mortgaged property which he held on restrictive tenure. The restriction was subsequently removed and as to the enlarged interest J Mookerjee said that the deed was operative as an executory agreement which attaches to the property the moment the restriction is removed, and is transferred by equity to the mortgagee. This case is very similar to Mokhoda Debi v Umesh Chandra,<sup>49</sup> which has already been referred to, but in which there was an erroneous representation by the ghatwal and which was, therefore, decided under s 43.

A very good instance of the distinction between the section and this equity is the case of Rustom Ali v Abdul Jubbur.<sup>50</sup> A transferred a field to his wife B in satisfaction of dower and another debt. But at the time of the transfer, the owner of the field was C, the sister of A. C sold the field to a party who sold it back to A. The lower appellate court had held that B was entitled to A's after-acquired interest in the field under s 43. This decision was objected to in second appeal on the ground that there was no finding that A had made an erroneous representation. The high court, however, thought it unnecessary to remand the appeal for a finding on this issue because the wife was entitled to it under the equity enunciated by J Mookerjee in Surendra v Rajendra.<sup>51</sup> Similarly, where a lessee assigned his interest in a lease which was contingent upon the demised property being derequisitioned by the military authorities, he was required to carry out the assignment after the property was derequisitioned.<sup>52</sup> This equity will not apply when the professed transfer is by a person incompetent to transfer, eg if the mortgagor is a judgment debtor whose property is being sold by the Collector in execution of a decree.<sup>53</sup>

This equitable interest (like that under s 43) is not available against a transferee for value without notice. A, an undivided coparcener in a Mitakashara family, made a mortgage to B of the family property which he was not authorised to make. Subsequently, there was a partition and a share of the family property was allotted to A. This share should have been liable to B's mortgage, but as A had sold it to C who had no notice of the mortgage. B could not enforce his mortgage against C.<sup>54</sup>

(14) Mortgages

In the case of transfer by way of mortgage, a discharge by a mortgagor of an encumbrance,<sup>55</sup> or of a prior mortgage,<sup>56</sup> enures for the benefit of the mortgagee. When the mortgagor of a chak acquires the mokarari interest that interest is an accession to the security, and passes with it to the purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree on the mortgage.<sup>57</sup> In a Calcutta case,<sup>58</sup> three coparceners mortgaged family property in which an aunt had a share reciting in the deed that 'the properties are owned and possessed by us.' After the mortgagee's suit the aunt died, and CJ Rankin held that the increased share of the mortgagors became liable to the mortgage not only under s 43, but also on the principle that any enlargement of the mortgagor's interest enures for the benefit of the mortgagee--s 70. In Basar Khan v Moulvi Syed Leekat,<sup>59</sup> the mortgage was of a mokarari interest which had been granted to the mortgagor by the widow of the owner. That interest failed as the widow proved to be only a benamidar. Nevertheless, as the mortgagor had inherited a share of the same estate from the real owner, the Privy Council held that the mortgage was binding to the extent of that share.

(15) Any Interests which the Transferor may Acquire

The section applies to all transfers except gifts, and it applies whatever the nature of the after-acquired interest may be. It applies when the transferor has no interest and subsequently acquires one, as in the case cited of the mortgage of the subject-matter of a pre-emption suit.<sup>60</sup> When the transferor has no interest, but subsequently acquires a charge upon part of the property, the benefit of that charge will pass to the transferee.<sup>61</sup> The section applies also when the transferor's interest is enlarged by the removal of a restriction on alienation,<sup>62</sup> or by the discharge of an encumbrance,<sup>63</sup> or of a prior mortgage<sup>64</sup> or when a maufi tenure ripens into a proprietary right.<sup>65</sup> In this connection Zollikofer & Co v Official Assignee<sup>66</sup> is an instructive case. S mortgaged property to Z, erroneously representing that he was the sole owner, when as a matter of fact, a quarter share belonged to J. The whole property was subject to a prior mortgage which S then redeemed. S obtained a decree for contribution in respect of one-fourth of the money due to him on the prior mortgage against J, and the decree made this a charge on J's quarter share. Z discovered the defects in S's title and S delivered the decree against J to Z. The delivery of the decree did not amount to an assignment, nevertheless the charge was a subsequent acquisition to which Z became entitled. Therefore, on J's insolvency, Z was entitled to a charge on J's quarter share as against the creditors of the insolvent. In Gurmair Singh v Udham Kaur,<sup>67</sup> when the transferor who was husband of the opposite party had subsequently acquired half share in property on death of his wife, it was held that the transferee would be entitled to get benefit of s 43 so far the said half share was concerned.

The section, of course, has no application if the transferor does not acquire a further interest in the property transferred,<sup>68</sup> or if such further interest is acquired not by the transferor, but by his successor-in-interest.<sup>69</sup> The section cannot apply where the transferor never became owner of the property and the same had been acquired by the parties in their own rights, and not as heirs of the persons who had contracted.<sup>70</sup>

(16) In such Property

The section applies when the transferee acquires an interest in the property which is the subject of the transfer. It does not apply to an interest acquired in any other property.<sup>71</sup>

(17) Subrogation

The principle of this section overrides the rule of subrogation enacted in s 92. A mortgages his property first to B and then to C and lastly, to D. If D redeems B, he is subrogated to the rights of B, and C is still subject to B's mortgage now held by D. But if A himself redeems B he is not subrogated to the rights of B and interest so acquired enures for the benefit of C and D, and has the effect of enlarging their security.<sup>72</sup> A mortgagor paying a debt for which he is liable cannot set up a charge against a subsequent encumbrance.<sup>73</sup>

(18) Third Parties

In cases of persons who contract to sell property, but with no title, the purchaser can take advantage of the subsequent acquisition of such title by the vendor and the law compels the vendor to convey the property if, by a supervening act or otherwise, his imperfect title or no title is perfected. This is the well known principle of feeding the grant by estoppel. If third persons are interested in the bargain and if the vendor can compel such persons to join in the transfer of such property over which he had no title or had only an imperfect title, then the purchaser can compel the vendor to procure such concurrence or compel such third parties to procure such a conveyance.<sup>74</sup>

(19) Execution Sales

The section has of course no application to execution sales.<sup>75</sup> An execution sale stands on a different footing. The decree holder does not guarantee the title of the judgment debtor, and the intending purchaser knows that under the law he can acquire nothing beyond the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor.<sup>76</sup> So when a ghatwal tenure was sold pending negotiations for its enfranchisement, the sale was invalid and the execution purchaser got nothing although the tenure was subsequently enfranchised.<sup>77</sup>

(20) At the Option of the Transferee

Subsequent acquisition of the title by the transferor does not automatically invest the transferee with the title so acquired; he must erase the option.<sup>78</sup> The word 'option' implies that the transferee may take the after-acquired interest, but that it cannot be forced upon him. The title in the after-acquired property does not pass the instant it is acquired, but only on demand made by the transferee, when the transferee exercises the option and the title passes, it does not vest in the transferee from the date of execution of the original document.<sup>79</sup> The option need not be exercised in any particular form.<sup>80</sup> It is not necessary that the transferee must give notice immediately to the transferor that he holds him bound by the agreement. It is not the exercise of the option that the subsequent transferee must have notice of, before he can be bound. It is not necessary to establish that the second transferee has known that the transferor's title was defective at the date of the first transfer, that the transferor later acquired interest which he had previously purported to transfer, and that the transferee had elected to hold the transferor bound by the agreement. The words 'notice of the existence of the option' have been used, as the first transferee who had an equitable interest only has nothing more than an option to proceed against the property included in his transfer, it being merely an equitable right, and not a transfer of legal interest. The second transferee must be deemed to have notice of the said option, if he has knowledge of the previous transactions.<sup>81</sup> Any action by the transferee, indicative of the exercise of the option, will suffice. A 'demand' is not required.<sup>82</sup>

The word 'option' in the section shows that the law has specified only one of the various remedies open to the transferee. The transferee can repudiate the contract, or he may elect to ask for damages. That he can do under the general law. The relief provided by the first paragraph is additional, and enables him to get at the property itself provided the contract subsists at the date.<sup>83</sup>

(21) At Any Time when the Contract of Transfer Subsists

The option of the transferee to require that the transfer should operate on any subsequently acquired interest can only be exercised while the contract subsists. If the transferee has rescinded the contract and elected to seek a remedy in damages, the contract is not in existence, and the transferee can have no interest in the subject-matter of the contract. If he had taken such partial interest as the transferor can convey, the contract has not been fully executed, and is still executory as to the remaining interest; and when that interest is acquired, the transferee can claim it.

A contractual obligation becomes extinguished by merger when it becomes the subject of a decree. Accordingly, it has been held that the option cannot be exercised after the transferee has obtained a decree on the contract. In an Allahabad case,<sup>84</sup> a Hindu mortgaged his own share and his brother's share. He had no authority to dispose of his brother's share, but he inherited that share on his brother's death, after the mortgagee had obtained a decree on the mortgage. It was correctly held that the inherited share was not liable to the mortgage.

It has been held by the Madras High Court<sup>85</sup> that though a contract of mortgage merges in the judgment and decree passed in the mortgage suit, 'it must be held to subsist all the same, till the mortgage is satisfied and the mere fact of the share in question having devolved on respondent subsequent to the decree appears to me to be no reason for holding s 43 of the Transfer of Property Act to be inapplicable'.<sup>86</sup> This decision which was criticised in an earlier edition of this work<sup>87</sup> has been reaffirmed and followed by the same High Court in Arulayi v Jagadeesiah,<sup>88</sup> in which the court held that the mortgage must be held to subsist for the purposes of s 43 until the property is actually sold. It is respectfully submitted that these decisions are correct as the mortgagor is entitled to redeem until the sale of the property,<sup>89</sup> and the mortgage undoubtedly subsists in that sense.

After the sale of the property, s 43 would be inapplicable, but the purchaser may still invoke s 115 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, read with the representation of title implied under s 65(a).<sup>90</sup>

(22) Proviso

The proviso protects transferees in good faith without notice of the option.<sup>91</sup> The option can be exercised against an heir of the transferor, and all persons claiming under him except a purchaser in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the option.<sup>92</sup> This is because until the option is exercised the transferee's right to the after-acquired property is only a contractual obligation, and the transferor holds the interest as his trustee.<sup>93</sup>

A representing that he had a transferable interest in property in which he had no such interest mortgaged it to B. A subsequently acquired the transferable interest which he transferred to C who had no notice of B's mortgage. The transfer was made before B had exercised his option, and, therefore, B's mortgage was subject to the rights of C.<sup>94</sup> In an Oudh case,<sup>95</sup> A mortgaged to B a share in property to which he had no title representing himself to be the owner. Subsequently, he acquired a charge over it by paying off a prior mortgage decree. Before B exercised his option, A assigned the charge to C. The court held that as C was not aware of B's option, he was not affected by the mortgage. But as the report shows that C was aware of B's mortgage, it is difficult to understand how he was unaware of the option, unless he was not aware that A had no title when he mortgaged.

(23) Other Cases of Estoppel

There may be other cases of estoppel operating in the realm of property law. Thus, a person who assents to a deed may be estopped from challenging the transaction. In a particular case, attestation may imply consent.<sup>96</sup>

Transfer by one co-owner

--Where one of two or more co-owners of immovable property legally competent in that behalf transfers his share of such property or any interest therein, the transferee acquires as to such share or interest, and so far as is necessary to give effect to the transfer, the transferor's right to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the property, and to enforce a partition of the same, but subject to the conditions and liabilities affecting at the date of the transfer, the share or interest so transferred.

Where the transferee of a share of a dwelling-house belonging to an undivided family is not a member of the family, nothing in this section shall be deemed to entitle him to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the house.

(1) Transfer by One Co-owner

The principle of this section is that of subrogation or substitution. When one of several co-owners transfers his share, the transferee stands in the shoes of the transferor. He acquires as against the other co-owners the same rights that the transferee had, and is subject to any condition and liabilities affecting the share at the date of the transfer. The section may be compared with s 74 where the ownership of the property is not divided between co-sharers, but between a mortgagor and a first and second mortgagee. The second mortgagee paying off the first mortgagee has all the rights the first mortgagee had against the mortgagor.

The object of this section as well as of s 4 of the Partition Act 1893 is to keep off strangers who may purchase the undivided share of a co-sharer of an immovable property, so far as dwelling houses are concerned to make it possible for a co-sharer who has not sold his share to buy off the stranger purchaser.<sup>97</sup>

Merely because, the plaintiff's ancestor was once a co-sharer of the alienee's predecessor-in-interest, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was a co-sharer in respect of the dwelling house so as to attract the provisions of s 44 of the TP Act.<sup>98</sup>

However, a person purchasing a share of a tenancy right is not entitled to a declaration of title to an exclusive possession of specific portion of the land.<sup>99</sup>

This section assures the transferee the right to joint possession or common enjoyment of the property, but does not confer on him any right to exclusive possession without enforcing partition.<sup>1</sup>

Illustration

A, B and C are co-owners of a field that is subject to a mortgage. C transfers his share to D. D has a right to joint possession with A and B, and has also a right to claim partition and separate possession of his share. But the share D has acquired is still subject to the mortgage.

The transferee of a co-sharer acquires the rights of his transferor so far as is necessary to give effect to the transfer, and no further. However, if a co-sharer is in exclusive possession of any portion of an undivided holding not exceeding his own share, he cannot be disturbed in his possession until partition. If instead of remaining in possession himself, he transfers the possession of his joint khata, the transferee will have the same rights and cannot be disturbed by other co-sharers until the final partition. In such a case, other co-sharers are only entitled to a declaration that the possession of the transferee will be that of a co-sharer subject to an adjustment at the time of partition.<sup>2</sup> A co-owner who is not in actual physical possession or exclusive occupation over a parcel of land cannot transfer a valid title to that portion of the property. The remedy of the transferee, in such cases would be to get a share from out of the property to be allotted to that co-sharer in partition or to get a decree for joint possession or claim compensation from the co-sharer.<sup>3</sup> The transferee of a Hindu coparcener may acquire a right to joint possession or to ascertain his share by partition, but he will not acquire the status of a coparcener in the family.

(2) Hindu Law

The section applies to Hindus, but it does not alter any rule of Hindu law. The rights of the transferee of a coparcener both as to joint possession, and as to partition vary in different schools of Hindu law and in different provinces. These differences are not affected by the section, for they are saved by the words 'subject to the conditions and liabilities affecting, at the date of the transfer, the share or interest so transferred.' In Madras, a purchaser from a coparcener is in no case entitled to joint possession. The Madras High Court has said that s 44 does not override this rule.<sup>4</sup> It is submitted that the saving clause as to conditions and liabilities shows that the section is not intended to override any such rule.

The purchaser of an undivided coparcener's interest in a joint Hindu family property is not entitled to possession of what he has purchased. His only right is to sue for partition and for allotment to him of that which, on partition, might be found to fall to the share of the coparcener whose share he has purchased. His right to partition would date from the period when a specific allotment was made in his favour. The fact that his transferor has executed a rent note is immaterial, since the rent note does not specify any specific portion of the house in occupation of the family; estoppel under s 116 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 is also not attracted.<sup>5</sup>

A Full Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court has held that according to the Mitakshara law, as administered in Madhya Pradesh, a coparcener can alienate for value of his undivided interest in coparcenary property without the consent of the other coparcener, but he has no right to alienate, his interest in any specific property belonging to the coparcenary, for no coparcener can before partition claim any such property as his own, and if he does alienate, the alienation is valid to the extent only of his own interest in the alienated property.<sup>6</sup>

The purchaser of the interest of a Hindu coparcener takes that interest subject to any charges or encumbrances affecting the coparcenary property, or interest at the time of the transfer.<sup>7</sup>

A Hindu coparcener filing a suit for partition must bring all the joint property into hotchpot, and his purchaser acquires the right to enforce partition, but is under the same obligation of suing for general partition.<sup>8</sup> The Allahabad High Court had held that the purchaser is entitled to partition of the specific property purchased without bringing a suit for general partition.<sup>9</sup> The section, however, is not merely restrictive in its operation, but while taking away a right of a stranger transferee of a share in a dwelling house to ask for joint possession, it also creates a right in favour of the other co-sharers to institute a suit for injunction restraining such transferee from exercising any act of joint possession in respect thereof.<sup>10</sup> This decision was always doubtful law, and must now be treated as superseded by the section. A purchaser of the undivided interest of a son in joint family property takes that interest subject to the Hindu law liability attaching to that interest of paying his father's personal debts not tainted with immorality.<sup>11</sup>

(3) Transfers his Share or Interest

The section applies to all transfers including sales and mortgages. However, partition must be necessary to give effect to the mortgage, if the transfer is in the nature of a mortgage.<sup>12</sup> A lessee of an undivided share can maintain a suit for partition, if partition is necessary to give effect to the lease.<sup>13</sup> Even a monthly tenant was allowed to enforce a partition when there was no probability of the lease being determined.<sup>14</sup> In a suit for partition there must be unity of possession and unity of title,<sup>15</sup> and a lessee of a share fulfils these conditions, for it is not necessary that the title should be of the same degree.<sup>16</sup> A lessee does not lose his right to partition because the lease is liable to forfeiture in certain contingencies.<sup>17</sup> When these conditions are fulfilled, the only ground on which partition can be refused is that of inconvenience.<sup>18</sup> Where, however, a co-owner has executed a usufructuary mortgage of his share in favour of another person, it is that person and not the original co-owner who is entitled to the unity of possession with other co-owners. So long as the mortgage subsists, the original co-owner cannot exercise any right to joint possession.<sup>19</sup> A usufructuary mortgagee from a coparcener, if not given possession, has to sue for partition and separate possession.<sup>20</sup>

It has been held that the section applies to all transferees; it is irrelevant whether a transferee is a defendant or a plaintiff.<sup>21</sup> Where several co-sharers enter into a contract to convey a joint property belonging to them, the contract can be enforced against one of them if the others are unable to convey their shares.<sup>22</sup>

(4) Conditions and Liabilities

As the transferee acquires the rights of the co-sharer, he is also bound by any conditions and liabilities affecting the share at the date of the transfer. Instances have already been cited under note 'Hindu law' above, with reference to a purchaser of a share of a Hindu coparcener. A purchaser of a share is of course not liable for the damage caused to the rest of the property by the transferor after the date of the transfer.<sup>23</sup>

(5) Dwelling House

The transferee of a share of a dwelling house of an undivided family cannot be put into joint possession. This exception follows the opinion of CJ Westropp in a Bombay case,<sup>24</sup> that such a procedure would be inconvenient, and lead to breaches of peace. The remedy is a suit for partition.<sup>25</sup> The proper course is to direct delivery of possession by partition in execution proceedings, or to leave the purchaser to his remedy by separate suit for partition.<sup>26</sup>

Where the dwelling house does not belong to an undivided family, s 44 of the TP Act does not apply.<sup>27</sup>

The Partition Act 1893, gives the co-sharer the option of buying out the transferee at a valuation to be made by the court. With reference to the Partition Act 1893 it has been held that the term 'dwelling house' includes not only the structure of the building, but also adjacent buildings, curtilage, court yard, garden or orchard, and all that is necessary to the convenient occupation of the house;<sup>28</sup> and that the phrase 'undivided family' is not limited to Hindus,<sup>29</sup> but includes any group of persons related in blood who live in one house under one head, and that it applies if they are undivided qua the dwelling house which they own.<sup>30</sup> The same construction applies to the words used in this section,<sup>31</sup> and it is not necessary that the family should have constantly lived in the dwelling house.<sup>32</sup> The test in order to determine whether a particular house is a family dwelling house is whether the family had abandoned all ideas of occupying the house as a residential house.<sup>33</sup>

In an earlier decision of the Madras High Court, it was held that the expression 'dwelling house' has a plain meaning, and did not necessarily connote a dwelling house occupied by an undivided family, owning it. The legislature might quite easily have used the term 'family dwelling house' if it had wished to do so, but it contended itself with the simple word 'dwelling-house'. So also, the words 'belonging to an undivided family' are quite unqualified and do not per se, at all import that the house must be occupied permanently or even temporarily by the undivided family.<sup>34</sup>

In a later decision, however, the same high court disagreed with the view that a house which was completely let out to tenants could fall within the expression 'dwelling house' belonging to an undivided family.<sup>35</sup>

A 'dwelling house' obviously is a house with the superadded requirement that it is dwelt in or the dwellers in which are absent only temporarily, having animus revertendi and the legal ability to return:

The existence of someone being able to go of his own right to all the rooms of the premises is one of the hallmarks of a dwelling house.<sup>36</sup>

If a person had abandoned his house as his residence, it would no longer be his dwelling house. Where a dwelling house belonging to an undivided family is let out to the tenants, no question of the transferee stranger coming into joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the house as such can arise, since it would be in exclusive possession and enjoyment of the tenants. If the members of the undivided family owning such a house, are in a position to obtain a decree of eviction and possess the requisite animus to dwell in the house, then the stranger transferee of a share of one of such co-owners will not be in a position to obtain joint possession or common enjoyment of the house with the members of the family. Even if an undivided family owns more than one dwelling house, the transferee of a share in a dwelling house in which the members of the family may not be actually residing at all points of time, will not be able to claim joint possession or common enjoyment of the house with the members of the undivided family so long they have not abandoned the house as their residence, and have animus revertendi and the legal ability to return to that house.

The nature of construction of the building as one unit and the land underneath remaining undivided, cannot lead to the conclusion that it is an undivided family dwelling house. If this is accepted for the purpose of attracting s 4 of the Partition Act 1893, there will be hardly any case where this provision will not apply.<sup>37</sup>

The character of a house as a dwelling house belonging to an undivided family is not altered by the mere fact that an undivided share is transferred to a stranger who comes into possession, and collects rents from a portion of the tenants.<sup>38</sup>

The section has, however, no application to a dwelling house a part of which is occupied by strangers after a partition.<sup>39</sup> The provision is of a negative nature. It affords a defence to the members of a joint family, but does not create a positive right in them. It gives discretion to the court to grant the relief.<sup>40</sup>

While construing the words 'dwelling house' belonging to an undivided family within the meaning of s 44 of the TP Act, the Supreme Court has held the ratio of the decisions rendered under s 4 of the Partition Act equally applicable to the interpretation of the second para of s 44, as the provisions are complementary to each other, and the terms 'undivided family' and 'dwelling house' have same meaning in both the sections.<sup>41</sup>

(6) Section 44 of TP Act and Section 4 of Partition Act 1893

The Supreme Court in Gautam Paul v Debi Rani Paul<sup>42</sup> has held that:

There is no law which provides that co-sharer must only sell his/her share to another co-sharer. Thus strangers/outsiders can purchase shares even in a dwelling house. Section 44 of the Transfer of Property Act provides that the transferee of a share in a dwelling house, if he/she is not a member of that family, gets no right to joint possession or common enjoyment of the house. Section 44 adequately protects the family members against intrusion by an outsider into the dwelling house. The only manner in which an outsider can get possession is to sue for possession and claims separation of his share. In that case, section 4 of the Partition Act comes into play. Except of section 4 of the Partition Act, there is no other law which provides a right to a co-sharer to purchase the share sold to an outsider.

It may noted that to avail the benefit of s 4 of the Partition Act 1893, conditions laid down in Ghanteshwar Ghosh v Madan Mohan Ghosh<sup>43</sup> have to be fulfilled.

(7) Involuntary Sales

The principle underlying this section can be applied to involuntary sales as a rule of equity, justice and good conscience.<sup>44</sup>

(8) Injunction against Stranger Transferees

Once it is held that the plaintiff is entitled to protection under the second part of s 44 and the stranger purchasers are liable to be restrained, it would follow that even if the defendants have been put in possession or have come jointly to possess, they can be kept out by injunction. The remedy of the stranger purchaser is actually one of partition and until then, he is obliged to keep out from asserting joint possession. Denying an injunction against such transferee would prima facie cause irreparable injury to the other members of the family. Thus, where the purchasers were inducted in the premises in a hurried and clandestine manner defeating the appellants' attempt to go to court for appropriate relief, the Supreme Court held that in such circumstances, it is but just and necessary that the respondent purchasers be directed by an interlocutory mandatory injunction to undo what they have done.<sup>45</sup>

Joint transfer for consideration

--Where immovable property is transferred for consideration to two or more persons and such consideration is paid out of a fund belonging to them in common, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interests in such property identical, as nearly as may be, with the interests to which they were respectively entitled in the fund; and, where such consideration is paid out of separate funds belonging to them respectively, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interests in such property in proportion to the shares of the consideration which they respectively advanced.

In the absence of evidence as to the interests in the fund to which they were respectively entitled, or as to the shares which they respectively advanced, such persons shall be presumed to be equally interested in the property.

(1) Co-owners' Interests

Where a transfer for consideration to two or more persons jointly makes them co-owners of the property transferred, their interests are in proportion to the shares of the consideration that they have been advanced. If the consideration is paid out of a common fund, their shares would be the same as their interests in that common fund. Although a mortgage is indivisible as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, yet as between the mortgagees inter se their interests in the property would be proportionate to the shares of the mortgage money they had advanced. Where four mortgagees advanced money in equal shares, and the fourth mortgagee consented to the mortgagor redeeming the other three mortgagees, he could only recover one-fourth share of the mortgage money by sale of one-fourth of the property mortgaged.<sup>46</sup> In an Allahabad case, there was a recital in a sale deed that the plaintiff had contributed one half of the consideration for the suit property, but his share was shown as 1/21. It was held that in view of s 45, his share would be one half. Since the dispute was not between vendor and vendee, but between two co-purchasers, s 92 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 would not come in the way.<sup>47</sup>

If two or more persons purchase a property out of common fund, the share of each of those persons would be the same as their interest in the common fund, then the rule in s 45 would be automatically attracted. The fact that the property was purchased in the name of one of the co-owners would not make a serious dent on the above rule of good conscience provided, however, it is established by acceptable evidence that such purchase in the name of the co-owner was by consent, and that the consideration for such purchase emanated from common fund.<sup>48</sup>

This section applies only where two or more persons purchase a property or an interest in property, and is of no assistance in ascertaining the position when one person purchases a property partly from ancestral, and partly from self-acquired funds.<sup>49</sup>

Section 45 has nothing to do with the method of creating common ownership, or the manner in which several persons can become co-owners in respect of a single property. It really deals with the quantum of interest, and its determination where there are several joint purchasers of immovable property.<sup>50</sup> Admissions made by co-sharers in income-tax and wealth-tax proceedings can be relied upon to ascertain the shares which they were having in the property in question for the purpose of s 45.<sup>51</sup>

Co-ownership is a relationship which springs from consensus and contract. Legislation has only imprinted, on the concept of co-ownership, certain rights which have a supervening effect which are declaratory of the rights inter se as between co-owners. The legal relationship (in co-ownership) is always knitted in a framework of jointness, and no one interested therein can predicate, with certainty, as to what portion of the property held in common is his, and an element of inseparability is inherent in the doctrine of co-ownership. What can be predicated by reason of s 45 and by invoking the principle of quasi-trust under the Indian Trusts Act 1882 is the quantum of rights of such co-owners in the entirety of the property. Such quantification of rights of each of the co-owners in a given property depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. It is for the purpose of providing a just rule for weighing and appreciating the value or interest of a co-owner in joint property that the rule of equity is laid down in s 45. If the source of the purchase price or the consideration for the investment in a joint enterprise emanates from a common fund, then the shares of each of the co-owners or co-entrepreneurs would be the same as their interest in that common fund. This equitable right is, of course, subject to an intent to the contrary.<sup>52</sup>

(2) Ejectment of One by the Other -- Permissibility

A partnership business was carried on by tenants A and B in the premises with shares in it. Subsequently, the firm was dissolved. In a suit by tenant A, the tenants B and A were declared to be in possession of three-fourth and one-fourth part of the premises respectively. It was held that A could not eject B or his successor.<sup>53</sup>

(3) Joint Tenancy or Tenancy in Common

The section does not deal with the question whether the transferee takes as joint tenants, or as tenants in common. A joint tenancy connotes unity of title, possession, interest and commencement of title; in a tenancy in common, there may be unity of possession and commencement of title, but the other two features would be absent.<sup>54</sup>

The rule of English law is to presume that a transfer to a plurality of persons creates a joint tenancy with a right of survivorship, unless there are words of severance.<sup>55</sup> This principle is adopted in s 106 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, replacing s 93 of the Indian Succession Act 1865; and a joint tenancy has been recognised in a gift by will of an Indian Christian,<sup>56</sup> Parsee,<sup>57</sup> and Muslim.<sup>58</sup>

The Hindu rule is the opposite. In Jogeswar Narain v Ram Chand Dutt,<sup>59</sup> the Privy Council said:

The principle of joint tenancy appears to be unknown to Hindu law, except in case of coparcenary between members of an undivided family.

This has been approved by the Supreme Court in Venkatakrishna v Satyavathi.<sup>60</sup> Even if the grantees are members of a coparcenary, they will take as tenants in common,<sup>61</sup> unless a contrary intention appears from the grant.<sup>62</sup> It is held that in India the court must always lean against holding a bequest or a grant to be a joint bequest or grant, and the presumption must always be in favour of a tenancy in common.<sup>63</sup> Words in a will that possession should be in the hands of both, and that both should enjoy the property in their lifetime is not enough evidence of a contrary intention.<sup>64</sup>

A joint tenancy may be severed and converted into a tenancy in common by one of the joint tenants disposing of or contracting to sell his interest, or by mutual agreement, or by a course dealing by all the joint tenants sufficient to indicate a severance.<sup>65</sup>

A tenant in common is entitled to joint possession, and if excluded from such possession may sue for a declaration of his right. However, if there is no exclusion or denial of his right, a tenant in common who gives up joint possession has no right of suit for his share of the joint profits.<sup>66</sup> Entry by one co-tenant, in the absence of clear proof to the contrary, enures for the benefit of all. The presumption under s 45 is not attracted when there is a joint business, and there is no partition of house and all members are staying in the house, and source of money for plot of land purchased appears to be the joint earning.<sup>67</sup>

If A and B are co-tenants of property of which A is in actual possession, and B sells his share to C, the possession of A is the possession of C.<sup>68</sup> But in a case where A and B were tenants in common, each in possession of a moiety and A took possession of B's share on B's death by right of inheritance, his possession was adverse to a purchaser from B.<sup>69</sup>

(4) Presumption of Equity

The second paragraph of this section lays down that in the absence of evidence as to the interests in the fund to which the co-owners are respectively entitled or as to shares which they respectively advanced, such persons shall be presumed to be equally interested in the property. In view of this provision, in State of Maharashtra v BE Billimoria,<sup>70</sup> the Supreme Court has held two persons to be owners of equal shares in the plot as there was no evidence to the contrary.

In the absence of evidence showing in what shares the consideration was paid, there is a presumption that the co-owners' interests are equal.<sup>71</sup> In a case where a common share which had been forfeited, was brought in by the Collector out of a fund contributed by the co-sharers, it was presumed that the Collector had debited an equal amount to each co-sharer, and that each co-sharer had an equal interest in the share when it was recovered.<sup>72</sup> It has been held that when a person can produce evidence of the amount of his share, but fails to do so, he cannot avail himself of this presumption of equality.<sup>73</sup>

It has been held that in the absence of specific mention about the shares of co-owners in any share deed, all co-owners will have equal shares in the properties thereunder.<sup>74</sup>

(5) Involuntary Sales

It has been held that the principle of this section applies to property purchased at an involuntary sale as it embodies a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>75</sup>

Transfer for consideration by persons having distinct interests

--Where immovable property is transferred for consideration by persons having distinct interests therein, the transferors are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to share in the consideration equally, where their interests in the property were of equal value, and, where such interests were of unequal value, proportionately to the value of their respective interests.

- (a) A, owning a moiety, and B and C, each a quarter share, of mauza Sultanpur, exchange an eighth share of that mauza for a quarter share of mauza. There being no agreement to the contrary, A is entitled to an eighth share in Lalpura, and B and C each to a sixteenth share in that mauza.
- (b) A being entitled to a life-interest in mauza Atrali and B and C, to the reversion, sell the mauza for Rs 1,000. A's life-interest is ascertained to be worth Rs 600, the reversion Rs 400. A is entitled to receive Rs 600 out of the purchase-money. B and C to receive Rs 400.

(1) Distinct Interest

This section is the converse of s 45. That section refers to interests in the property of several purchasers, while this section refers to the shares in the consideration of several vendors. Tenants in common have joint possession, but distinct interests. A tenant for life and a remainderman have distinct interests, and so have a mortgagee and a mortgagor, and a lessee and a lessor.<sup>76</sup> The value of the interest of a mortgagee is the mortgage money, and when a mortgagee and a mortgagor join in a conveyance, then, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the mortgagee is entitled to the mortgage money as the price of his interest, and the mortgagor to the balance as the price of the equity of redemption. The shares of the transferors in the consideration are in proportion to their respective interests in the property transferred. The second illustration is that of a tenant for life and a remainderman, where it is necessary to have the respective interests valued.

Transfer by co-owners of share in common property

--Where several co-owners of immovable property transfer a share therein without specifying that the transfer is to take effect on any particular share or shares of the transferors, the transfer, as among such transferors, takes effect on such shares equally where the shares were equal, and, where they were unequal, proportionately to the extent of such shares.

Illustration

A, the owner of an eight-anna share, and B and C, each the owner of a four-anna share, in mauza Sultanpur, transfer a two-anna share in the mauza to D, without specifying from which of their several shares the transfer is made. To give effect to the transfer one-anna share is taken from the share of A, and half-an-anna share from each of the shares of B and C.

(1) Transfer by Tenants in Common

When owners who hold an estate as tenants in common transfer a part of the estate, the share of each co-owner is proportionately reduced. If the shares are equal, each share is reduced equally. If the shares are unequal, there is a greater reduction in the greater share, and a lesser reduction in the lesser share. If each co-owner had a distinct plot, it would not be a case of a tenancy in common, and there could be no question of a transfer of a share of the whole. The word 'value' is more appropriate in s 46 which includes interests in land which have to be valued, while the word 'extent' in this section means only the fraction that each share bears to the whole. The same fraction would determine the share of the consideration that each co-owner would be entitled to under s 46. All co-owners have equal rights and coordinate interest in the property, though their shares may be either fixed or indeterminate. Each co-owner has, in theory, interest in every infinitesimal portion of the subject-matter and each has the right, irrespective of the quantity of his interest, to be in possession of every part and parcel of the property jointly with others.<sup>77</sup>

The principle of this section was applied in a Sind case,<sup>78</sup> where two Mahomedan zamindars who held an estate as tenants in common in equal shares sold an undivided half of it. One of the zamindars had been under the protection of the manager, encumbered estates, and was by virtue of the Sind Encumbered Estates Act (Bombay Act 20 of 1891) incapable of alienating beyond his lifetime. After his death his heirs sued for partition, and it was held that the vendee had taken one-fourth from each zamindar, so that the heirs were entitled to one-fourth.

Priority of rights created by transfer

--Where a person purports to create by transfer at different times rights in or over the same immovable property, and such rights cannot all exist or be exercised to their full extent together, each later created right shall, in the absence of a special contract or reservation binding the earlier transferees, be subject to the rights previously created.

(1) Priority

The transferor cannot prejudice the rights of the transferee by any subsequent dealing with the property. This self-evident proposition is expressed in the equitable maxim qui prior est tempore potior est jure. The application of this maxim in English law is complicated by the preference given to the legal estate over the equitable interest. This complication does not occur in Indian law, but the rule in India is subject to certain exceptions which will presently be noticed.

Registered deed --

A transfer operates from the date of execution of the deed, although it may have been registered at a later date.<sup>79</sup> This is the effect of s 47 of the Registration Act 1908.

(2) Successive Transfers

If there are successive transfers of the same property, the latter transfer is subject to the prior transfer.

Thus, if A mortgages his property to B, and subsequently sells it to C, C purchases only the equity of redemption.<sup>80</sup> Similarly, in the case of two successive mortgages, the later or puisne mortgage is subject to the prior mortgage. The puisne mortgagee is only an assignee of the equity of redemption of the prior mortgage, and as such may sue to redeem it s 91 (a).

A puisne mortgagee may sue for sale on his mortgage, but the property will be sold subject to the prior mortgage.<sup>81</sup> If he sues for sale making the prior mortgagee a party, but claiming no relief against him, the prior mortgagee is in the position of a holder by title paramount outside the controversy.<sup>82</sup> If the mortgagor gives two usufructuary mortgages of the same property, the prior mortgagee is entitled to possession.<sup>83</sup>

A mortgage by deposit of title deeds is a completed transfer, and not an oral agreement. This is now made clear by s 58(f) of TP Act. The proviso to s 48 of the Registration Act 1908 as inserted by Act 21 of 1929, enacts that a mortgage by deposit of title deeds shall take effect as against any mortgage deed subsequently executed and registered relating to the same property; similarly, an earlier mortgage by deposit of title deeds would have priority over a subsequent sale.<sup>84</sup> Mortgages by deposit of title deeds are sometimes described as equitable mortgages. The judgment in an old Bombay case<sup>85</sup> suggests that a formal registered mortgage being a legal 'mortgage' would have priority over an 'equitable mortgage.' In Imperial Bank of India v U Rai Gyaw<sup>86</sup> Lord Dunedin said:

It is to be observed that there is here no distinction between a legal and equitable mortgages as in English law, where the legal mortgage will always prevail against the equitable unless the holder of the legal had done or omitted to do something which prevents him in equity from asserting his paramount rights.

A charge is not a transfer of an interest in property, and an oral non-possessory charge has no priority over a subsequent mortgage if the mortgagee has no notice of it. This is the effect of s 100 of TP Act. In a case in which s 100 was construed as not having retrospective effect, the same conclusion was arrived at by reference to s 48 of the Registration

Act 1908.<sup>87</sup>

A Raja made a grant of certain villages to the defendant as maintenance for life, and then gave a putni of the villages to the plaintiff on the allegation that the grant to the defendant had been revoked. However, as the grant had not been revoked, the court held that the putni took effect after the death of the defendant.<sup>88</sup>

(3) Same Date

If two mortgages are executed on the same date, evidence may be taken as to which was executed first, and the first has priority. If this cannot be determined, the mortgagees take as tenants in common, or joint tenants.<sup>89</sup>

(4) Exceptions

There are several exceptions to the rule of priority. Section 50 of the Registration Act 1908 gives a subsequently registered deed priority over a prior unregistered deed of which registration is optional. This exception is subject to the doctrine of notice,<sup>90</sup> and only applies when the deeds are antagonistic, and not when effect can be given to one without infringement of the other.<sup>91</sup> However, since optional registration has been abolished by TP Act as regards sale deeds by s 54, and as to mortgage deeds by s 59 as amended by Act 6 of 1904, the scope of this exception is very limited, being applicable only to those territories to which TP Act does not extent.

Under s 98 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (Bengal Act 8 of 1885) a previous mortgage by a co-owner of his share was subject to a subsequent charge created by a manager over the whole estate.<sup>92</sup>

Similarly, in a suit for partition, if a receiver, under the direction of the court mortgages the whole or part of the estate, the mortgagee would be entitled to priority over an execution creditor by whom the property was attached after the commencement of the suit for partition.<sup>93</sup> Again, when a court for the purpose of preserving the property in suit, directs the receiver to execute a mortgage, it has jurisdiction to order that the mortgage shall take precedence over prior charges.<sup>94</sup> This is an application of the equity which gives salvage liens, ie, liens for money advanced for the purpose of saving the property from destruction or forfeiture, priority over all their encumbrances. With regard to such liens the general rule is reversed, and they are entitled to priority in inverse order to their dates.<sup>95</sup> Salvage liens are confined in English law to maritime liens. A salvage lien was claimed in an old Calcutta case<sup>96</sup> in respect of an advance made for the purpose of carrying on an indigo factory, and again in another case<sup>97</sup> in respect of an advance made to enable the mortgagor to pay the rent of the premises mortgaged, but in both cases the claim was repelled.

The lien of a co-sharer for oweltly money on partition is entitled to precedence over prior mortgagees of property allotted to the co-sharer who is liable to pay oweltly.<sup>98</sup>

(5) Priority Forfeited

Priority is forfeited by fraud, misrepresentation or gross negligence.<sup>99</sup>

If a prior mortgage is to secure future advances and expresses the maximum to be secured, a puisne mortgagee who has notice of the prior mortgage is not entitled to priority over subsequent advances by the prior mortgagee within the amount of the expressed maximum.<sup>1</sup>

Transferee's right under policy

--Where immovable property is transferred for consideration, and such property or any part thereof is at the date of the transfer insured against loss or damage by fire, the transferee, in case of such loss or damage, may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, require any money which the transferor actually receives under the policy, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be applied in reinstating the property.

(1) Insured Property

If the property is at the date of the transfer insured against loss or damage by fire, the section enacts that the transferee may require the transferor to apply the insurance money, in case of damage by fire, to the restoration of the premises. If the transfer is a mortgage, the mortgagor, as the insured would receive the insurance money, and the mortgagee would have the right to require it to be applied as the section directs, in reinstating the security;<sup>2</sup> and he can do so against a creditor of the mortgagor who has attached the insurance money.<sup>3</sup> If the mortgagor failed to do so the mortgagee would have the right, under s 68(b), to sue for his mortgage money. In the case of a lease the lessor would receive the insurance money, and the lessee would under this section require the lessor to restore the property. If the property were wholly destroyed or rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased, the lessee has the option of avoiding the lease under s 108(e), and in that case he would have no right under this section.

In Gnana Sundaram v Vulcan Insurance Co,<sup>4</sup> the Rangoon High Court held that a contract to purchase confers upon the intending purchaser an insurable interest; but it is submitted that this is a misapplication of the English doctrine of equitable ownership.

The purchaser cannot himself claim the insurance money from the insurance company.<sup>5</sup>

Rent bona fide paid to holder under defective title

--No person shall be chargeable with any rents or profits of any immovable property, which he has in good faith paid or delivered to any person of whom he in good faith held such property, notwithstanding it may afterwards appear that the person to whom such payment or delivery was made had no right to receive such rents or profits.

Illustration

A lets a field to B at a rent of Rs 50, and then transfers the field to C. B, having no notice of the transfer, in good faith pays the rent to A. B is not chargeable with the rent so paid.

(1) Rents Paid Bona Fide

This section protects rents paid bona fide to a holder under a defective title. Similar provisions occur in s 109 of TP Act, and in s 148 of the Agra Tenancy Act (Uttar Pradesh Act 12 of 1881); and as regards to actionable claims, in s 130 of TP Act. In a Bombay case,<sup>6</sup> the lessor's interest passed on his death first to his brother and then to his sister, but the lessor's widow collected the rents when the person entitled was the sister. Nevertheless, as the payments were made in good faith and without notice of the sister's interest, the tenant was not chargeable. A mortgage of tenanted property operates as an assignment of the lessor's interest, and the mortgagee is entitled to recover the rent from the date of the mortgage; but rents paid bona fide to the mortgagor without notice of the mortgage are protected.<sup>7</sup>

The illustration refers to the case of a transfer by a lessor, as to which s 109 enacts that if the lessee not having reason to believe that such transfer has been made, pays rent to the lessor, the lessee shall not be liable to pay such rent over again to the transferee.

There is no statutory obligation on the assignee to give notice of the assignment to the lessee, but if he omits to do so and the lessee pays rent to the assignor, the assignee will not be entitled to recover it from the lessee.<sup>8</sup> On the other hand, if the assignee of the lessor gives notice to the lessee, he will be entitled to the rent after the assignment.<sup>9</sup>

(2) Rent Paid in Advance

In order to get the benefit of s 50 the tenant must have paid the rent, as rent, and not in advance, for a payment in advance is treated as a loan.<sup>10</sup> The reason is that section refers to the fulfilment of an obligation imposed by law to pay rent, while payment in advance is a loan to the landlords with an agreement that on the day when the rent becomes due such loan will be treated as the fulfilment of the obligation. Rent that is payable in advance by the terms of the lease is of course paid as rent, and not as a loan.<sup>11</sup>

The definition of 'lease' in s 105 is wide enough to cover a lease accompanied with payment of advance rent. As the rent note was registered under the Registration Act 1908, the plaintiff must, by virtue of the definition of 'notice', be deemed to have notice of all the contents of the registered document. Since the defendant tenant had paid in advance the rent to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, s 50 of the TP Act (rent bona fide paid to holder under defective title not to be charged again) operates so as to protect the defendant tenant in such cases. Section 18 of the Bombay Rent, Hotel and Lodging House Rents Control Act 1947 does not prevent the application of s 50, and plaintiff could not recover the rent claimed by them.<sup>12</sup>

(3) Good Faith

The payment is not protected unless it is made in good faith. In Sivaswami Odayar v Subramania Aiyar<sup>13</sup> the court of execution erroneously refused to stay a sale although the judgment debtor had applied under the Provincial Insolvency Act to be declared insolvent. The Official Receiver declined to recognise the sale and granted a lease of the property that had been sold. The lessee paid rent in good faith to the Official Receiver and was not chargeable again with rent by the court auction purchaser. But if a tenant knowing that there is a dispute between two persons claiming to be landlords, arbitrarily chooses to pay one, he does so at his own risk.<sup>14</sup> A payment to the transferor after notice is not a valid payment.<sup>15</sup>

Improvements made by bona fide holders under defective titles

--A surety is entitled to the benefit of every security which the creditor has against the principal-debtor at the time when the contract of suretyship is entered into, whether the surety knows of the existence of such security or not; and if the creditor loses, or without the consent of the surety, parts with such security, the surety is discharged to the extent of the value of the security.

--When the transferee of immovable property makes any improvement on the property, believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled thereto, and he is subsequently evicted therefrom by any person having a better title, the transferee has a right to require the person causing the eviction either to have the value of the improvement estimated and paid or secured to the transferee, or to sell interest in the property to the transferee at the then market value thereof, irrespective of the value of such improvement.

The amount to be paid or secured in respect of such improvement shall be the estimated value thereof at the time of the eviction.

When, under the circumstances aforesaid, the transferee has planted or sown on the property crops which are growing when he is evicted therefrom, he is entitled to such crops and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them.

(1) Improvements by Holder of Defective Title

This section is an application of the equitable maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity.

The equity involved in this section was enforced by the Privy Council in Kidar Nath v Mathu Mal,<sup>16</sup> a case from Punjab, and not governed by the TP Act. A Hindu widow sold property in which she had only a widow's estate without legal necessity, and the reversioner, at whose instance the sale was set aside and the vendee evicted, was put on terms to compensate the vendee for the improvements he had made. The section was applied by the Privy Council in a case in which a Hindu widow made a gift to a stranger of property inherited by her, and the donee sold the property, and the purchaser effected improvements believing in good faith that he was the owner.<sup>17</sup>

The section is almost identical with s 2 of the Mesne Profits and Improvements Act 1855. There are similar provisions with reference to tenants' compensation in the Bengal Tenancy Act.

The section does not rest upon estoppel, and, therefore, stands clear of the line of cases headed by Ramsden v Dyson<sup>18</sup> in which the owner is put on equitable terms by the doctrine of estoppel by acquiescence.

(2) Scope of the Section

The scope of the section is limited, as it applies to a transferee who in good faith believes himself to be absolutely entitled. It is essential not only to plead that the transferor thought that he was absolutely entitled to the property, but also that the transferee knew that the transferor so thought and was led by the transferee's inaction so to think.<sup>19</sup> Where a husband builds on the land belonging to his wife knowing he has no right to do so, the latter is entitled to the building.<sup>20</sup> Section 51 of the TP Act has no application where the transfer of land granted was null and void under s 4(1) of the Karnataka Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes Act 1978.<sup>21</sup>

As a general rule, improvements made to the property by a life tenant thereof attach to the estate, and pass to the reversioner or remainderman at the expiration of the life estate without any liability on his part to make compensation thereof. The same holds true of improvements made by a purchaser from one who holds a limited interest, for it is presumed that such purchaser knows the title which he acquires.

Lessee --

A lessee cannot appeal to this section,<sup>22</sup> even if he is a permanent lessee.<sup>23</sup> When a Hindu widow granted a permanent lease, the lessee, when evicted by the reversioner, was not entitled to compensation for improvements he had made, for he could not have believed himself to be absolutely entitled.<sup>24</sup> In a case<sup>25</sup> decided by Madras High Court it was held that a perpetual lessee is entitled to the benefit of this section, but it is submitted that the judgment confuses the rule in this section with the doctrine of equitable estoppel. The correctness of this decision has since been doubted in a later Madras case<sup>26</sup> where J Wadsworth referred to the author's comments in the last sentence with approval. A lessee may, however, be entitled to relief under the rule of estoppel by acquiescence.<sup>27</sup>

Mortgage --

The improvements made by a mortgagee qua mortgagee is now codified in s 63A.

Law prior to insertion of s 63A: An assignee of the equity of redemption with knowledge of the mortgage cannot invoke s 51 as he could never have believed that he was absolutely entitled to the property.<sup>28</sup> A mortgagee is not a person absolutely entitled, but in some cases it has been held that he may in good faith believe himself to be absolutely entitled.<sup>29</sup> As to the facts which may induce such a belief, the cases are not consistent. In Gopi Lal v Abdul Hamid,<sup>30</sup> a mortgage of 1859 contained a stipulation that in default of payment within two and a half years, the mortgagee was to be the owner of the property. The suit for redemption was filed nearly 60 years after the due date, but the court observed that the rule 'once a mortgage always a mortgage' was as clear in 1859 as it was today, that the mortgagee could not have believed himself to be absolutely entitled, and so refused compensation for a building which the mortgagee had erected. However, in a somewhat similar case from Madras,<sup>31</sup> where a condition converting a mortgage into a sale was held to be a clog on the equity of redemption, the mortgagee who was misled by the condition into believing himself to be the absolute owner, was allowed compensation for improvements. Compensation was also allowed in a Punjab case,<sup>32</sup> where the mortgagee who made improvements was misled by a term of the mortgage that after five years the transaction was to be treated as a sale. In Narayan v Ganesh,<sup>33</sup> the Bombay High Court allowed compensation to a mortgagee who was misled by an erroneous order of the court, and believed himself to be absolutely entitled. In Ramappa v Yellappa,<sup>34</sup> the mortgagee was not allowed compensation. Justice Madgavkar said:

In regard to improvements, s 51 of the Transfer of Property Act does not appear to have been relied upon in the lower courts. But in any case, the respondents must be taken to have had notice of the existence of Kristappa (one of the mortgagors) so that they could not be said to have believed in good faith that they were entitled to the whole.

Other Bombay cases seem to have been decided irrespective of this section, and to refer to improvements made by a mortgagee qua mortgagee. In one case,<sup>35</sup> a Hindu widow mortgaged property without legal necessity, and the mortgagee with her consent reconstructed a building on the mortgaged property which had been destroyed by floods. On the death of the widow, the reversioner was allowed to redeem without compensating the mortgagee. But in a subsequent case,<sup>36</sup> where the facts were similar, CJ Macleod said that though the position of the mortgagee was not the same as that of a person who thinks he has an absolute title to the property by sale, yet there was an equity in his favour.

(3) Conditions to be Fulfilled

Two conditions must be fulfilled before the equity enacted in this section arises. These are:

- (1) the person evicted must be a transferee; and
- (2) he must have made the improvements believing in good faith that he was absolutely entitled.

(4) Transferee

The following are instances of transferees who have been given the benefit of the section: a purchaser who purchased bona fide in ignorance of a mortgage;<sup>37</sup> a purchaser from a de facto guardian of a minor who erroneously believed that the guardian had authority to sell;<sup>38</sup> a purchaser of a life estate who believed that his vendor was absolutely entitled;<sup>39</sup> a purchaser who was put in possession of a larger area than he was entitled to and who in ignorance of the mistake made improvements on the excess area;<sup>40</sup> a transferee under an oral sale of immovable property worth Rs 100 or more;<sup>41</sup> and the successors-in-title of the last surviving coparcener of a Hindu joint family who were divested by reason of a subsequent adoption.<sup>42</sup> However, when a tenant raises a plea of estoppel under the section, it is incumbent upon him to show that the conduct of the landlord whether consisting of abstention from interference or in active intervention, was sufficient to justify the legal interference that he had by plain implication contracted that the right of tenancy under which the lessee originally obtained possession should be changed into a perpetual right of occupation.<sup>43</sup>

ILLUSTRATIONS

- (1) A purchased the property of a Mahomedan minor from his mother who was acting as de facto guardian, believing in good faith that she had authority to sell. When A was evicted by the minor he was entitled to compensation for improvements that he had made.<sup>44</sup>
- (2) A grantee of land from a Tahsildar, believing himself to be absolutely entitled, improved the land by laying out a casuarina plantation. The Collector revoked the grant and evicted the grantee, but the latter was entitled to compensation for the improvements.<sup>45</sup>

In all these cases, the rule was applied when the transferee was evicted by the better title. But the principle of the section was applied to a case<sup>46</sup> where there was no direct eviction, and no better title. A purchaser had erected a building on land which was subject to a mortgage of which she was unaware. The court directed the mortgagee to pay the cost of the improvement as a condition precedent to bringing the property to sale in enforcement of his mortgage.

Again, a purchaser who had made improvements to property which he was under covenant to reconvey was allowed compensation when sued in specific performance of his covenant.<sup>47</sup>

In a Bombay case,<sup>48</sup> a de facto guardian of a minor sold the minor's house to the defendant who, believing that he had become absolutely entitled, pulled down the house, and built a new one. The guardian had no authority to sell and when the minor attained majority and evicted the defendant, the latter was allowed compensation for the improvement. The case was exactly under the section, for the minor had the better title and had evicted the transferee who had made improvements in good faith. Chief Justice Marten, however, observed that the section applied even when the evictor is the transferor. This dictum was not necessary as the minor was not the transferor, his case being that the guardian did not represent him. It is submitted that the dictum is too broadly stated, for if the evictor were the transferor, other considerations would arise, and the transferor might be estopped from derogating from his own grant.

In a Allahabad case,<sup>49</sup> a Hindu father sold his son's share in a house without legal necessity, and when the vendee was evicted by the son he was allowed compensation for improvements made in good faith. Justice Ashworth seemed to think that s 51 would not apply as a defeasible title, nor to a defective title. It is submitted that this is a distinction without a difference. The case was one of eviction by better title.

The section is not applicable to a son governed by the Dayabhaga law, who makes improvements on the ancestral property.<sup>50</sup> Nor is the section applicable to a case in which a person makes improvements on the land of another, not under a mistake as to his right or where he is not encouraged in such a mistake by the inactivity of the owner of the land. The section does not apply where an allottee of a plot by government erroneously enters upon and improves another plot.<sup>51</sup>

The section is of course not applicable to improvements made by the transferor, and when a purchaser from a Hindu widow is evicted by the reversioner, he cannot claim compensation for improvements made by the widow.<sup>52</sup> It has been held by the Calcutta High Court<sup>53</sup> that the section does not apply to a person who has not himself made the improvements, but has purchased the property from the improver, the Madras High Court has, however, expressed a contrary view.<sup>54</sup>

A purchaser making improvements with the knowledge that the property does not belong to him cannot claim the benefit of s 51.<sup>55</sup> Similarly, the section has no application to a case where the person making improvements does not hold under a perpetual lease, and does not claim an absolute title to the land.<sup>56</sup> Benefit of s 51 cannot be availed of by a person who was merely in permissive possession of the licensee, whose licence was terminated, and was not a bona fide occupant in his own right.<sup>57</sup>

Trespasser --

A trespasser is not a transferee, and is not entitled to compensation for improvements.<sup>58</sup> A trespasser to government land is not entitled to compensation.<sup>59</sup>

If, however, a trespasser acting bona fide erects a structure, he is upon ejectment, entitled to remove the materials.<sup>60</sup> If he, in good faith, plants trees, he is entitled to its usufruct thereof. The owner can claim compensation for the use, and occupation of the land in which the trees are planted.<sup>61</sup>

Where there was no evidence that the plaintiff had encouraged the defendant to trespass and to incur expenses, the trespasser must be evicted.<sup>62</sup>

There are no equities in favour of a trespasser,<sup>63</sup> or of a person fraudulently in possession.<sup>64</sup> In fact, the construction of buildings by such a person is only an aggravation of the trespass for which the appropriate remedy is an injunction for their removal.<sup>65</sup> However, a person who encroached by mistake on adjoining land and cleared it of jungle, believing it to be his own, was held to be entitled to compensation when evicted.<sup>66</sup>

In a Madras case, in a suit for declaration and possession of vacant land, the allegation was that the defendant had trespassed on the land, and had put up super-structures on it. However, nothing had been done by the owner of the land to stop it. This acquiescence of the owner, resulted in the owner being held liable to compensate him.<sup>67</sup>

(5) Good Faith

The words 'believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to' are important portions of the section. In order to entitle an occupant of land to claim compensation, as a general rule, it is necessary that he must have held possession under colour of title, his possession must not have been by mere permission of another, but adverse to the title of the true owner and he must be under an honest belief that he has secured good title to the property in question and is the owner thereof.<sup>68</sup>

Good faith is here used in the sense of the phrase as defined in the General Clauses Act 1897, ie, 'A thing shall be deemed to be done in "good faith" where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not.' It will be observed that the requirement of reasonable care, which occurs in ss 38 and 41, is omitted in this section. That requirement would be appropriate, for if the defect in title were due to want of authority or ostensible ownership and reasonable care had been exercised, the defective title would be cured by estoppel and the question of compensation could not arise.<sup>69</sup> The expression 'believing in good faith' merely means honestly believing.<sup>70</sup> Honest belief is not incompatible with negligence,<sup>71</sup> or with a mistake of law.<sup>72</sup>

On the other hand, as said by Lord Selbourne in Agra Bank v Barry,<sup>73</sup> omission to investigate title may be evidence, if it is not explained, of a design, inconsistent with bona fide dealing, to avoid knowledge of the title. Accordingly, it has been said that if a person consciously avoids making an inquiry, though he may have a belief in the matter, it would not be a belief in good faith.<sup>74</sup> Thus, a purchaser from a Hindu widow who omits to make inquiry as to the circumstances justifying the sale cannot be said to believe in good faith that he has acquired an absolute title.<sup>75</sup> However, this is not a rule of law, for the state of a man's mind is a question of fact<sup>76</sup> and in exceptional cases, a purchaser from a Hindu widow who sold without necessity, or after her estate was divested by an adoption, has been held to have believed in good faith in his absolute title.<sup>77</sup> It has been observed that good faith may be inferred from the very fact that the transferee expended a large sum of money on the improvements.<sup>78</sup>

Compensation has also been allowed where the gift was for the religious benefit of the widow's husband's soul, and the donee believed himself to be absolutely entitled.<sup>79</sup>

A person who makes improvements in anticipation of a grant cannot be said to have believed himself to be absolutely entitled.<sup>80</sup> A person who is aware that his title is terminable is not entitled to the benefit of the section.<sup>81</sup> The test is whether the transferee had acted in the bona fide belief that he was absolutely entitled.<sup>82</sup>

A purchaser with notice of a prior contract of sale by his vendor is not entitled to compensation for improvements when evicted.<sup>83</sup> Improvements made pending litigation are not made in good faith, for the party knows he is running a risk and if he is in possession under a decree, he must be aware that the decree may be reversed on appeal.<sup>84</sup>

(6) Court Sale

The section does not apply to a purchaser at a court sale,<sup>85</sup> and a purchaser at a court sale who has made improvements is entitled to compensation irrespective of any question of bona fides, when the judgment is reversed and the sale becomes invalid.<sup>86</sup>

(7) Operation of Law

Section 51 applies to inter vivos transfers. It does not apply to a transfer made by operation of law. In Harishchandra Hegde v State of Karnataka,<sup>87</sup> land was granted by the government in favour of one person who in turn sold it to the transferee, who allegedly invested a lot of money for improvement of the land. However, by s 5 of the Karnataka Scheduled Caste and Scheduled Tribe (Prohibition of Transfer of Certain Land) Act 1978, all lands were resumed and restored to the original grantee. The Supreme Court held that if a judicial order is passed restoring the land back to a member of the scheduled tribe in terms of the purpose and object of the said Act, the provisions of the TP Act cannot be applied since the latter is governed by a special statute.

(8) Option as to Compensation

The transferee may, on eviction, be compensated in two ways:

Either by being paid the value of the improvements; or by buying out the better title at a valuation of the property irrespective of the improvements.

It is settled law that the option as to the mode of compensation is that of the evictor, who can either pay the value of the improvements and take the land, or sell the land instead of evicting the transferee.<sup>88</sup> A mortgagee who has erected a building on the property mortgaged and who was not entitled to the benefit of the section was allowed by the Allahabad High Court to remove the building materials.<sup>89</sup> It is submitted that this is correct, for the equity under this section does not affect the right recognised before the TP Act in Paramanick's case.<sup>90</sup> The Rangoon High Court had disagreed on the ground that this section is an exception to the principle quicquid plantatur solo , solo credit.<sup>91</sup> But this maxim does not generally apply in India.<sup>92</sup> In a case<sup>93</sup> where the evictor did not have the means to pay for the improvements, the Allahabad High Court made an order requiring him to sell the property. A transfer was made by a limited owner, which was challenged by the reversioners. Questions arose regarding improvements. Compensation was valued by the trial court, but the high court (on appeal) remanded the case to the trial court, to give opportunity to the plaintiffs to make a choice under s 51. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that as the transferee had made valuable constructions involving an expense of Rs five to six lakhs, in the circumstances, it would not be equitable to re-open the matter of compensation, and to call upon the transferee to pay the present market price. Further, the acceptance, by the high court, of the amount fixed by the trial court was, in the circumstances of the case, held to amount to a choice within the first part of s 51.<sup>94</sup>

(9) Improvements

Ordinary operations of agriculture such as manuring and levelling land are not improvements within the meaning of this section.<sup>95</sup> Section 63A refers to improvements by a mortgagee, and the phrase there includes necessary repairs. But under this section repairs are not improvements,<sup>96</sup> and it has been held that putting a new staircase into an old house is an ordinary repair, and not an improvement.<sup>97</sup>

(10) Valuation

The valuation of improvements would be, as pointed out in Kidar Nath v Mathmal<sup>98</sup> not the amount expended in making the improvement, but the extent to which the value of the property as a marketable subject has been enhanced thereby. It has been observed by a single Judge of the Bombay High Court that a transferee is even entitled to the general rise in prices since the date of transfer;<sup>99</sup> sed quaere.

The valuation has to be made as on the date of actual eviction, and not the date of the exercise of the option by the real owner.<sup>1</sup>

(11) Executing Court

The executing court cannot go behind the decree fixing compensation according to the Kerala High Court.<sup>2</sup>

(12) Crops

If the transferee has grown crops upon the land in the bona fide belief that he is absolutely entitled, he has the right to remove them on eviction. Ancillary to that right he has the right of free ingress and egress to gather and carry them away. This right constitutes no bar to eviction, but after the eviction the transferee has the right to carry away the crops.<sup>3</sup> A similar right is reserved to a lessee of uncertain duration when evicted for no fault of his own (s 108(i)).

The ordinary rule is that the right to growing crops passes with the sale of the land and when a mortgagee in possession brings the land to sale, he cannot recover the value of the crops he has grown, from the purchaser.<sup>4</sup>

(13) Lien

The transferee has no lien on the land for the value of improvements.<sup>5</sup>

(14) Mesne Profits

Even if a transferee is not entitled to compensation under this section, yet if a decree for mesne profits is passed against him, he will be entitled to credit for profits due to his improvements. This is expressly enacted in s 2(12) of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, and for the reason that mesne profits are in the nature of damages. An instance of such an order is to be found in the case of Raja Rai Bhagwat Dayal v Ram Ratan Sahu.<sup>6</sup>

(15) Equitable Estoppel by Acquiescence

Some cases<sup>7</sup> and indeed some textbooks treat s 51 as an extension of the equitable doctrine of estoppel by acquiescence. Inspite of a superficial similarity, the two cases rest on totally different principles of foundation. Estoppel by acquiescence occurs when the person having the better title knows a fact unknown to the other persons acting in violation of the right which that fact gives, and does not inform them about it, but lies by and lets them run into a trap.<sup>8</sup>

The distinction between this class of case and s 51 is as follows:

- (1) Estoppel by acquiescence looks to the conduct of the prospective evictor, while s 51 looks to the conduct of the person evicted.
- (2) Estoppel by acquiescence does not merely put the evictor upon equitable terms, but compels him to make good his representation and prevents him from eviction. Section 51 merely puts the evictor upon equitable terms as to compensation. The one denies the right; the other admits the right, but raises a plea in mitigation of it.
- (3) Estoppel by acquiescence rests on the doctrine of estoppel, while s 51 rests on the maxim that he who comes unto equity must do equity.
- (4) To invoke the concept of estoppel, defendant has to plead each act or omission that constitutes representation from the plaintiff and consequential acts by the defendant and prove them. However, s 51 can be invoked when the defendant who is found to have made improvements on the property is neither a trespasser, nor has he pleaded and established estoppel.<sup>9</sup>

(16) *Ramsden v Dyson

In Ramsden v Dyson,<sup>10</sup> Lord Kingsdown said:

The rule of law applicable to the case appears to me to be this: If a man, under a verbal agreement with a landlord for a certain interest in land, or what amounts to the same thing, under an expectation created or encouraged by the landlord, but he shall have a certain interest, takes possession of such land, with the consent of the landlord, and upon the faith of such promise or expectation, with the knowledge of the landlord, and without objection by him, lays out money upon the land, a court of equity will compel the landlord to give effect to such promise or expectation.

This principle was applied by the Privy Council in Forbes v Ralli.<sup>11</sup> In that case, the landlord granted a lease to the defendant 'for the purpose of erecting buildings for trade.' The defendant then asked permission to erect a residence for his manager. The plaintiff replied that the lease was a permanent lease which gave the tenant the right to erect buildings, but that the rent was liable to enhancement. Relying on this assurance, the defendant built the residence. The plaintiff then sought to evict the defendant, but the Privy Council held that whatever the nature of the tenancy in its inception, the plaintiff was estopped from questioning its permanency. Mr Ameer Ali delivering the judgment of the Board said:

Estoppel prevents the plaintiff from evicting from their holding the defendants, whom he, the plaintiff, induced by his representation and conduct to believe that they had a fixity of tenure, although not of rent, in the lands that had been leased to them. It gives effect to the representation that induced them to act as they did.

The equity of Ramsden v Dyson<sup>12</sup> has been approved by the Supreme Court in Collector of Bombay v Bombay Municipal Corporation<sup>13</sup> and Union of India v Indo-Afghan Agencies,<sup>14</sup> though the latter was a case more of promissory estoppel.

The rule in Ramsden v Dyson is, in India, subject to the exception that a party building on the land of another is allowed to remove the building. The right of course does not exist, when the action is malafide and tortious, but when there is acquiescence and bona fide belief.<sup>15</sup> In Lala Beni Ram v Kundan Lall,<sup>16</sup> the Privy Council has observed that:

the owner of land cannot sue for ejectment where he sees another person erecting buildings upon it, and knowing that such other person is under the mistaken belief that the land is his own property, purposely abstains from interference with the view of claiming the building when it is erected.

The Supreme Court has also held that:

no man, who knowing fully well that he has no title to the property spends money on improving it can be permitted to deprive the original owner of his right to possession of the property except upon the payment for the improvements which were not effected with the consent of that person.<sup>17</sup>

Other Indian cases in which the principle is referred to are cited below.<sup>18</sup> Where the owner of the property kept quiet for several months when the trespasser was putting up a portion of his main building, acquiescence may be presumed.<sup>19</sup> In Nundo Kumar v Banomali Gayan,<sup>20</sup> the doctrine is explained to be outside the scope of s 51.

English cases where this rule has been applied are cases where the true owner stood by while his manager forged a mortgage;<sup>21</sup> where the true owner permitted an adjoining owner to build a garage on his property, which the latter believed to be his own;<sup>22</sup> and where a lessee, who erroneously represented that a portion of the property was part of the property demised to him, was forced, under a covenant to repair, that portion even though it was found to be outside the lease.<sup>23</sup>

(17) Implied Contract and Equitable Estoppel

There is a class of cases which is sometimes referred to as equitable estoppel, although it is really one of implied contract. The defendant has a limited interest as lessee or mortgagee and is aware of the plaintiff's rights, but the plaintiff's conduct has led him to believe that those rights will not be enforced against him, and the defendant has erected buildings or altered his position in consequence of such belief. In such a case, a promise to compensate the defendant is implied. In Lala Beni Ram v Kundan Lall,<sup>24</sup> yearly tenants erected substantial buildings and then contended that they could not be evicted, but the Privy Council rejected this contention saying that in order to raise the equitable estoppel against the lessors it was incumbent on the lessees 'to show that the conduct of the owner, whether consisting in abstinence from interfering or in active intervention, was sufficient to justify the legal inference that they had by plain implication contracted that the right of tenancy under which the lessees originally obtained possession of the land should be changed into a perpetual right of occupation.' In many such cases, the conduct of the landlord is construed as an implied agreement to compensate the tenants when evicted.<sup>25</sup> Where a mortgagee spent money in repairing a well, the consent of the mortgagor was implied.<sup>26</sup>

Similarly, when the original grant was lost and the tenant had been 25 years in possession and had erected buildings to the knowledge of the lessor, the court presumed that the grant was of a permanent tenancy for building purposes.<sup>27</sup>

However, if there is no implied promise, and the tenant had made improvements or erected buildings merely in the hope that he will not be dispossessed, the landlord cannot be deprived of his right to take back his property with all the improvements imprudently made by the tenant.<sup>28</sup>

Transfer of property pending suit relating thereto

--During the pendency in any Court having authority within the limits of India excluding the State of Jammu and Kashmir or established beyond such limits by the Central Government.... of any suit or proceeding which is not collusive and in which any right of immovable property is directly and specifically in question, the property cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the suit or proceeding so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein, except under the authority of the court and on such terms as it may impose.

Explanation .-- For the purposes of this section, the pendency of a suit or proceeding shall be deemed to commence from the date of the presentation of the plaint or the institution of the proceeding in a Court of competent jurisdiction, and to continue until the suit or proceeding has been disposed off by a final decree or order and complete satisfaction or discharge of such decree or order has been obtained, or has become unobtainable by reason of the expiration of any period of limitation prescribed for the execution thereof by any law for the time being in force.

(1) Amendments

This section has been amended by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) State Amendment: Gujarat and Maharashtra

Section 52 was amended in Bombay by Bombay Act 4 of 1939 to read as follows:

52. (1) During the pendency in any court having authority within the limits of India excluding the State of Jammu and Kashmir established beyond such limits by the Central Government, of any suit or proceeding which is not collusive and in which any right to immovable property is directly and specifically in question, if a notice of the pendency of such suit or proceeding is registered under section 18 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, the property after the notice is so registered cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the suit or proceeding so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein, except under the authority of the court and on such terms as it may impose.

(2) Every notice of pendency of a suit or proceeding referred to in sub-section (1)

shall contain the following particulars, namely:--

- (a) the name and address of the owner of immovable property or other person whose right to the immovable property is in question;
- (b) the description of the immovable property the right to which is in question;
- (c) the Court in which the suit or proceeding is pending;
- (d) the nature and title of the suit or proceeding; and
- (e) the date on which the suit or proceeding was instituted.

Explanation : (As in the original Act.) This amendment was declared by Bombay Act 57 of 1959 to be in force in the whole of the then recognised State of Bombay and is, therefore, in force in the whole of the present State of Gujarat and Maharashtra. Under s 2 of the Bombay Act of 1939, however, the amended section only applies to immovable properties situated wholly or partly in Greater Bombay; but the State Government is empowered to extend its application to other areas by notification. A suit regarding immovable properties situated outside areas so notified is not, of course, affected by the amendment.<sup>29</sup> In view of the amendment, the rule of lis pendens under s 52 of the Act will operate in the notified areas provided the lis is registered in the manner required by the local amendment.<sup>30</sup>

(3) Lis Pendens

The section enacts the doctrine of lis pendens which is expressed in the maxim 'ut lite pendente nihil innovetur.' It imposes a prohibition on transfer or otherwise dealing of any property during the pendency of a suit, provided the conditions laid down in the section are satisfied.<sup>31</sup> The scope of the section is discussed in the undernoted cases.<sup>32</sup> The principle on which the doctrine rests is explained in the leading cases of Bellamy v Sabine,<sup>33</sup> where LJ Turner said:

It is, as I think, a doctrine common to the Courts both of Law and Equity, and rests, as I apprehend, upon this foundation -- that it would plainly be impossible that any action or suit could be brought to a successful termination, if alienations pendente lite were permitted to prevail. The plaintiff would be liable in every case to be defeated by the defendant's alienating before the judgment or decree, and would be driven to commence his proceedings de novo, subject again to be defeated by the same course of proceeding.

Delhi High Court held that the principle of s 52 applies even where the TP Act does not apply, because the section is based on justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>34</sup> Similar is the view of the Gujarat High Court.<sup>35</sup> Where an interest larger than that possessed by the transferor is transferred during the pendency of litigation, the transfer is affected by the principle of lis pendens. The transferee would still be a representative-in-interest of the judgement debtor.<sup>36</sup>

Section 52 creates only a right to be enforced to avoid a transfer made pendente lite, because such transfers are not void, but voidable--and that too, at the option of the affected party to the proceedings, pending which, the transfer is effected. Ex hypothesi, the right accrues only to such parties, and in such circumstances as are expressly envisaged under s 52. One who claims the right must establish the same, before he can enforce it. The right contemplated under s 52, no doubt, can be used both as a sword and a shield, depending on such facts as to (i) what right or interest is transferred; (ii) who the affected party is; and (iii) how and, in what manner the 'transfer' is likely to 'affect' any party to the pending 'proceeding'. It can be used as a shield in a subsequent of the same proceeding between the same parties. Any person who would like to use it as a sword must, however, first establish his right to do so when, in any subsequent proceedings, objection is taken to his claim to do so. Indeed, if the transfer was not avoided by any of the parties to the earlier proceeding likely to be affected by such transfer, the transferee is not prevented from claiming that the right to avoid the transfer was lost, and that nothing survived to be enforced.<sup>37</sup>

(4) Notice how far Material -- State Amendments

Lord Cranworth in Bellamy v Sabine explained that the doctrine did not rest on the ground of notice. His Lordship said:

It is scarcely correct to speak of lis pendens as affecting a purchaser through the doctrine of notice, though undoubtedly the language of the courts often so describes its operation. It affects him not because it amounts to notice, but because the law does not allow litigant parties to give to others, pending the litigation, rights to the property in dispute, so as to prejudice the opposite party.

These judgements were quoted and followed by the Privy Council in Faiyaz Husain Khan v Prag Narain,<sup>38</sup> which is the leading case on the doctrine of lis pendens in India. In a Calcutta case, J Mookerjee speaking of the application of the doctrine of suits for specific performance of contracts to transfer immovable property, said that if, when the jurisdiction of the court had once attached, it could be ousted by the transfer of the defendant's interest, there would be no end to litigation, and justice would be defeated.<sup>39</sup>

The doctrine of lis pendens is intended to strike at attempts by parties to a litigation to circumvent the jurisdiction of a court in which the dispute on rights or interests in immovable property is pending, by private dealings that may remove the subject matter of litigation from the ambit of the power of the court to decide a pending dispute, or which may frustrate its decree.<sup>40</sup>

The rule is, therefore, based not on the doctrine of notice, but on expediency, ie, the necessity for fine adjudication.<sup>41</sup> It is immaterial whether the alienee pendente lite had, or had not, notice of the pending proceeding.<sup>42</sup> This is, of course, no longer the case in England, or in Gujarat and Maharashtra, where the doctrine only affects transactions pendente lite if the lis has been duly registered.

Story in his work titled Equity Jurisprudence says, in a passage that is frequently quoted by the courts in India, that the effect of the maxim is not to annul the conveyance, but only to render it subservient to the rights of the parties to the litigation.<sup>43</sup> The section merely declares what was already law, for the doctrine was acted upon in many cases before the passing of the TP Act.<sup>44</sup>

The principle of lis pendens, embodied in s 52, being a principle of public policy, no question of good faith or bona fides arises.<sup>45</sup> The defence of bona fide transferee for value without notice is not available.<sup>46</sup>

It has been held by the Supreme Court that a plea of lis pendens will be allowed to be raised even though the point is not taken in the pleadings or raised as an issue.<sup>47</sup> However, Madras High Court has held that the plea of lis pendens cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal in absence of any issue framed by the trial court and appellate court.<sup>48</sup>

Registration --

It need hardly be said that it makes no difference to the operation of the rule that the transfer is by registered deed while the suit is on an unregistered instrument.<sup>49</sup>

(5) Lis pendens between co-defendants

At the same time, the party whose rights are affected must be a party between whom and the party alienating, there is an issue for decision. As in res judicata, the rule of lis pendens will not apply between co-defendants, unless the relief claimed in the suit involves a decision between them.<sup>50</sup> This is illustrated by the following case.<sup>51</sup> The plaintiff sued for a declaration that he was not bound by his sale to A , nor by A 's mortgage to B . In the suit, A and B made common cause against the plaintiff and a decree was passed affirming the sale, but declaring that the plaintiff had a lien for unpaid purchase money in priority to B 's mortgage. During the pendency of the suit, the property was purchased in execution of a money decree against A . After the suit, B filed a suit, to enforce his mortgage and contended that the execution purchase was barred by lis pendens from disputing it. But the court held that the rule of lis pendens did not apply, as there was no issue between A and B .

(6) Compromise or Consent Decree

The fact that a suit results in a consent is no bar to the application of the doctrine of lis pendens.<sup>52</sup> As was observed in a Calcutta case:<sup>53</sup> unless a compromise is collusive, the very fact that there is a compromise shows that the suit was in its origin and nature contentious, otherwise there would be nothing to compromise.

However, if the compromise had not been fairly and honestly obtained, the suit which ended in the compromise will not operate as a lis pendens.<sup>54</sup> If, however, the suit is withdrawn and a compromise is then recorded in a conveyance between the parties, such compromise would not be protected by the doctrine of lis pendens.<sup>55</sup> It is hardly necessary to add that when a compromise includes matters which do not relate to the suit, the compromise would not be protected as to such extraneous matter. The broad principle underlying the section is to maintain the status quo unaffected by the act of any party to the litigation pending its determination and the expression --'decree or order' includes a decree or order made pursuant to the agreed terms of compromise. When a mortgage was effected by one of the parties during the pendency of a suit between the parties in which the claim to the property was the subject matter of the suit, it was held to be bad.<sup>56</sup> In a partition suit, a compromise decree was passed. During the pendency of suit, a transfer by way of gift was made. The transferor who was the plaintiff in the suit had admitted the claim of contesting the opposite party regarding the share in property. It was held that the transferee could not claim any right. The fact that it was a compromise decree, did not matter. The transferee is as much bound by the decree, as when he was a party to the suit. He puts himself in privity with the suit, and cannot be treated as a stranger.<sup>57</sup>

(7) Not Collusive

The substitution of the words 'any suit or proceeding which is not collusive' for the words 'a contentious suit or proceeding' does not import any change in the law. It only gives effect to the judgment of the Privy Council in Faiyaz Hussain Khan v Prag Narain,<sup>58</sup> and these are the very words used by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Krishnappa v Shivappa.<sup>59</sup> Thus, if during the pendency of a collusive maintenance suit by a Hindu wife against her husband, a person bona fide purchases the property of her husband, the charge subsequently created in favour of the wife on such property cannot be allowed to prevail against the purchaser's superior rights.<sup>60</sup> The doctrine, therefore, comes into operation from the very moment of the institution of a bona fide suit which is in no way collusive.<sup>61</sup> Merely because the defendant in the suit admitted the plaintiff's claim, it would not render the suit non-contentious within the meaning of the section, as it stood before the amendment.<sup>62</sup>

A collusive suit, it has been held by the Supreme Court,<sup>63</sup> differs from a fraudulent suit. The court referred to the definition of 'collusion' in Wharton's Law Lexicon and observed:

In such a proceeding, the claim put forward is fictitious, the contest over it is unreal and the decree passed therein is a mere mask having the similitude of a judicial determination and worn by the parties with the object of confounding third parties. But when a proceeding is alleged to be fraudulent, what is meant is that the claim made therein is untrue, but that the claimant has managed to obtain the verdict of the court in his favour and against his opponent by practicing fraud on the court. Such a proceeding is started with a view to injure the opponent, and there can be no question of its having been initiated as the result of an understanding between the parties. While in collusive proceedings, the combat is a mere sham, in a fraudulent suit it is real and earnest.<sup>64</sup>

A suit may be collusive in its very inception, or a decree may be obtained by collusion in a suit which has honestly begun. Where the parties to a suit entered into an agreement for the express purpose of defeating the rights of a transferee and obtained a decree in terms of the agreement, the rule of lis pendens did not apply.<sup>65</sup> Where a compromise decree passed in an appeal arising from a partition suit did not indicate shares allotted to each branch and it showed that inspite of knowledge that properties were alienated during the pendency of civil suit, the party praying for setting aside such alienation insisted for allotment of alienated portion in its favour and there was delay of four years in presentation of the said decree before trial court despite knowledge of fact that mutation of properties was effected in name of aliens, it was held that decree was obtained in collusion and hence, s 52 is not applicable.<sup>66</sup> With reference to the word 'contentious' in the old section, it has been suggested that the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to friendly suits brought by agreement of parties to obtain a declaration by the court of their rights.<sup>67</sup> However, such suits are neither fraudulent, nor collusive, and there can be no doubt but that they fall within the scope of the section. A collusive proceeding is binding on the immediate parties, but not on their transferees.<sup>68</sup>

(8) Suits Decided Ex Parte

It is now settled law that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the doctrine of lis pendens applies to a suit which is decided ex parte.<sup>69</sup>

(9) During the Pendency--Explanation

The section has now been simplified by the omission of the words 'active prosecution,' and it applies to transfers during the entire 'pendency' of the suit. The question then arises, for what period is the suit pending. There are many decisions on this point, but these have lost much of their importance, for the question is, to a great extent answered by the explanation now added by the amending Act 20 of 1929; and the rule laid down in the explanation has been applied as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience in Punjab, where the TP Act is not in force.<sup>70</sup> The explanation was added to affirm the correct view to be taken regarding the application of the rule of lis pendens.<sup>71</sup>

(10) Commencement of Suit

A suit is commenced by the filing of a plaint, and appeals and execution proceedings are a continuation of the suit. A miscellaneous proceeding commences with the presentation of a petition or application. Where an application to sue in forma pauperis is admitted, the suit is pending from the time of presentation of the application to the court,<sup>72</sup> but not if it is rejected.<sup>73</sup> In decisions before the explanation was enacted, it had been held that when a plaint is presented in a higher court, and is returned for presentation to the court of the lowest grade competent to try it, the suit is pending from the time of the first presentation, for s 15 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908 is only a matter of form.<sup>74</sup> Similarly, it had been held that an alienation effected in the interval between the presentation of a plaint to a lower court and its rejection and representation before a court of higher grade competent to try it, is affected by lis pendens.<sup>75</sup> It is submitted that the later case is no longer good law after the amending Act of 1929, for the explanation clearly provides that a suit is deemed to commence from the date it is presented or instituted in a court of competent jurisdiction. Where there is inherent lack of jurisdiction in a court, any decree pronounced by it would be a nullity,<sup>76</sup> and alienation made pending such proceedings cannot, it is submitted, be affected by s 52. The position may well be different where the proceedings are instituted in a higher court, for the failure to institute them in the court of the lowest grade competent to try it, may be regarded as a mere irregularity. This view has been adopted in two cases decided after 1929.<sup>77</sup>

On the other hand, it has been held that if the plaint is insufficiently stamped and is rejected and is then represented after making good the deficiency, an alienation between the two dates of presentation would not be subjected to lis pendens.<sup>78</sup> If however, the court does not return the plaint, but recovers the deficit fee, the principle of lis pendens would apply.<sup>79</sup> If a suit is dismissed for default and then restored, the order of restoration relates back and a transfer after dismissal and before restoration is subjected to lis pendens.<sup>80</sup> However, an amendment of the plaint will not relate back for the purpose of lis pendens.<sup>81</sup> So also, if a suit is instituted into a wrong court which had no jurisdiction and was returned for presentation to the proper court, an alienation effected before its presentation to the proper court is not affected by lis pendens.<sup>82</sup> In an Allahabad case,<sup>83</sup> the suit was to cancel a deed of gift, but the plaint omitted reference to a particular property which the defendant sold before it was included in the suit by an amendment of the plaint. The court held that the sale was not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens. Where, however, the property is transferred after an application has been made for amendment to include the property, but before the order for amendment has actually been made, the section will apply, for the order for amendment will relate back to the date of the application. This will be so even when the transfer is made by the heir of a deceased defendant before such heir has been brought on record.<sup>84</sup>

(11) Conclusion of Suit--Appeal and Execution

An appeal or execution proceeding is a continuation of the suit, and lis pendens continues during the appeal or execution.<sup>85</sup> The explanation to s 52 of the TP Act indicates that the pendency of a suit would encompass the stage after the final decree till complete satisfaction and discharge of such decree or order. It is, therefore, obvious that legislature for different contingencies had thought it fit to extend the scope and ambit of the terminology 'suit' even for covering the execution proceedings with decree passed in such suits.<sup>86</sup> A lease from a decree holder will not bind his adversary if the decree is reversed on appeal.<sup>87</sup> Even after the dismissal of a suit, a purchaser is subject to lis pendens, if an appeal is afterwards filed.<sup>88</sup> There is a case from Bombay which seemed to hold that lis pendens terminated with the decree.<sup>89</sup> With this exception, cases under the old section recognized that lis pendens may continue after the decree. A suit for sale on a mortgage is pending after the preliminary decree for sale,<sup>90</sup> and until the security is realised for the satisfaction of the judgment creditor.<sup>91</sup> A suit for foreclosure is pending until the decree is absolute for foreclosure.<sup>92</sup> A suit to enforce a mortgage by sale continues after the decree nisi for sale or the preliminary decree for sale, and a purchaser,<sup>93</sup> or a lessee;<sup>94</sup> or a subsequent mortgagee;<sup>95</sup> after a preliminary decree for sale takes subject to the rights of the auction purchaser at the execution sale. A theatre was attached in execution of a decree against the owner. A lease of the theatre executed in favour of a company during the attachment, was held to be hit by the doctrine of lis pendens and also by s 64, Code of Civil Procedure 1908. In this case, the plaintiff was the holder of a mortgage decree in respect of the theatre as also the assignee of the money decree in execution of which the theatre was attached.<sup>96</sup> A third person purchasing property from judgment debtor during pendency of proceedings cannot have a right to object execution in view of s 52.<sup>97</sup> Legal representatives of original judgment debtor cannot raise objection for transfer of property to the auction purchaser by claiming tenancy right in such property specially when alleged lease created in favour of legal representative was subsequent to the passing of the decree.<sup>98</sup>

A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court has held<sup>99</sup> that an appeal by special leave under art 136 of the Constitution being an 'extra-ordinary' appeal, a transfer pending the grant of such leave would not be affected by lis pendens. This view was, however, reversed by the same high court in a later judgment.<sup>1</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A mortgaged property to B . B sued on the mortgage and obtained a decree nisi for foreclosure. Before the decree was made absolute, A sold the property to C . The decree for foreclosure was made absolute and it was held that C was not entitled to redeem. If he had purchased before the suit, he would have been entitled to redeem though not made a party. But as his purchase was pendente lite, he was bound by the decree.<sup>2</sup>
- (2) A mortgaged property to B . B sued A on the mortgage and obtained a decree for sale. While this decree was in execution, A leased the property to C for 10 years. B brought the property to sale and purchased it himself. As C 's lease was affected by the rule of lis pendens, it was held that B was entitled to evict C.<sup>3</sup>
- (3) A mortgaged property to B . B sued on his mortgage and obtained a preliminary decree for sale. A then made a usufructuary mortgage of the same property in favour of C . B obtained a final decree for sale and in execution, the property was sold and purchased by D . C 's usufructuary mortgage was invalid as against D under the rule of lis pendens. D was entitled to recover possession from C and to recover also all rents collected by C from the date of D 's purchase.<sup>4</sup>
- (4) A , as executor of the deceased owner mortgaged an entire taluk to B . Afterwards C , an co-sharer of one-fourth in the taluk mortgaged his one fourth share to D . B filed a suit on his mortgage but did not implead D . During the pendency of B 's suit, E purchased one-sixth share from one of the co-sharers. B obtained final decree for sale in his suit and purchased the property in the court sale, and transferred his interest to E . D then filed his suit on his mortgage and obtained a final decree for sale and purchased the mortgaged property, ie, one-fourth share himself at a court sale. D then filed a suit against B and E for redeeming B 's mortgage of the whole taluk . Held that as between B and D , D was entitled to redeem the whole taluk and not merely the one-fourth share, because not having been impleaded as a defendant in B 's suit, his right of redemption remained intact. Held further that, E having purchased one-sixth share during the pendency of B 's suit, as between B and E , E 's right was subject to B 's rights as purchaser in the court sale in execution of the final decree in B 's suit but as between D who was not a party to B 's suit and there was no question of lis pendens and E 's right to redeem remained intact and E having stepped into B 's right, D could only be entitled to redeem five-sixth of the taluk .<sup>5</sup>

A purchaser from a defendant, who is being sued for possession and against whom a decree for possession and mesne profits is made, takes subject to the decree, and the decree for mesne profits may be executed against him as from the date on which he enters into possession.<sup>6</sup> Where, however, the decree for mesne profits does not create a charge on the properties transferred, it is a mere money decree, and cannot affect the transfer.<sup>7</sup>

The explanation enacts what had already been decided, namely, that the doctrine of lis pendens applies not only during the pendency of the suit, but also of the appeal which finally disposes off the suit; and if the decree is executory, until satisfaction of the decree by execution or until further execution is barred by limitation.<sup>8</sup>

(12) Application for Review or Revision

The explanation would appear to exclude applications for review or revision. An alienation in the interval between a final decree and an application for review or revision would not, it seems, be subject to the rule of lis pendens. However, an alienation while such an application was pending would no doubt be subject to the order made thereon. There is one case on the point, but it is a curious case, for although the application for review was successful, and a money decree was altered into a mortgage decree, yet the court refused to apply the principle of the section as there had been a delay in applying for a review.<sup>9</sup>

(13) Writ Petition

Any action taken during the pendency of writ petition shall be hit by the principle of lis pendens.<sup>10</sup> It has been held that a proceeding instituted under arts 226 and 227 of the Constitution which is not collusive and in which only a right to immovable property is directly and specifically in question, will be a proceeding attracting s 52 of the TP Act, and as such the property concerned cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the proceeding so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under an order which may be passed therein, except under the authority of the high court, and on such terms as it may impose.<sup>11</sup>

(14) Meaning of Proceeding

A proceeding before a settlement officer is not a proceeding which can operate as a lis pendens under this section.<sup>12</sup> However, a Registrar of Co-operative Societies is a court, and a proceeding under r 14 of the Co-operative Societies Act 1912 operates as a lis pendens.<sup>13</sup> The principle of the section has been applied to revenue proceedings by the Orissa High Court.<sup>14</sup> However, the Madhya Pradesh High Court has held that since the restitution proceedings which were filed before the revenue court for restoration of possession were not in the nature of suit and the restitution application was neither the continuation of the suit, nor an application for execution of any decree and is only a summary proceeding, sale during the pendency of such proceeding is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens.<sup>15</sup>

(15) Any Party

These words are not merely descriptive, but refer to the time when the transaction takes place. A puisne mortgagee who is not joined as a party in a prior mortgagee's suit is not a party and an assignment by him during the suit is not affected by lis pendens although the assignee is subsequently joined in the suit.<sup>16</sup> A transferee pendente lite is a representative in interest of the transferor who is a party to the suit and is also a person bound by the decree, even though he was not made a party to the suit.<sup>17</sup> No person who has entered into possession through the party obtaining an ex-parte decree or order can resist or obstruct restitution on the ground that he is a bona fide transferee without notice.<sup>18</sup>

During the pendency of the suit for sale filed by a mortgagee, three of the defendant mortgagees were declared insolvents, and their share vested in the official receiver. A decree was passed in the suit without impleading the official receiver. It was held that a sale by the official receiver was not bad on the ground of lis pendens.<sup>19</sup>

A party to a suit whose name is struck off as a party by consent is not bound by the decree, actually or constructively, and is not, therefore, affected by the doctrine of lis pendens.<sup>20</sup>

The plea of lis pendens cannot, however, be availed of by the person who himself transfers the property pendente lite.<sup>21</sup> The same principle has been applied to involuntary sales, where the interest of the plaintiff in the suit property was sold in execution of a money decree, and purchased by the defendant.<sup>22</sup>

(16) Any Other Party

Illustration

A brought a suit against B as a legal representative of the deceased C and obtained a decree. Subsequently, D who was another legal representative of C , filed a suit for a declaration that the decree passed against B was not binding on the property of C . During the pendency of that suit, the property was sold in execution of the decree in the first suit. It was held that s 52 had no application as D was not any other party, but a legal representative of C.<sup>23</sup>

It may be true that a decree for injunction compels personal obedience, and in appropriate cases would not be enforced against the legal representatives. However, this proposition must have a qualification, and the qualification is that when the injunction relates to doing or not doing something in a property that was the subject matter of the earlier suit, and the act of complaint was on the basis of ownership of an adjacent property or a right claim in the property of the other side, then such a decree for injunction would be binding not only against the judgement debtor personally, but against all those who claim through him.<sup>24</sup> A transferee of a transferee from the judgment debtor is also bound by the principle of lis pendens since at best, he can step into the shoes of his vendor.<sup>25</sup>

Call it the principle of lis pendens or call it by any other name, the policy of our law is that normally an assignee or a legal representative is bound by the decree obtained by the assignor or the predecessor in interest. This is the policy underlying our procedure, and is recognised by s 146; o 21, r 16 and the explanation to that rule; s 11 and s 50 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908; and s 52 of the TP Act.<sup>26</sup>

(17) Affect the Rights

The purchaser pendente lite is bound by the result of the litigation.<sup>27</sup> If the other party has assented to the transfer, he cannot afterwards object to it on the ground of lis pendens.<sup>28</sup> In an Allahabad case,<sup>29</sup> A sued to recover possession of an immovable property from B. While this suit was pending, A mortgaged the property to C. The suit for possession ended in a compromise, by which half the property was allotted to A and the other half to B, and one of the terms of the compromise was that B should discharge the mortgage. C then sued to enforce his mortgagee's half share and was of course liable; but as the mortgage was executed pendente lite, the half share of B was not liable. If B had assented to the mortgage, his share would have been liable. But his agreement to discharge the mortgage was subsequent to the mortgage and created a personal liability, not to C, but to A. C could recover on the personal liability against A and then A could sue B for an indemnity.

A compromise of a dispute as to the transfer of an equity of redemption, after a redemption suit had been filed, was held not to affect the rights of the mortgagee, as both the transferor and the transferee were parties to the redemption suit.<sup>30</sup> A compromise of a partition suit by which a father surrenders his interest to his minor sons and appoints trustees to manage the property for their benefit and to pay the family debt, is not within the scope of this section.<sup>31</sup>

In a Madras case,<sup>32</sup> a creditor sold property of a deceased debtor in execution of a decree against the widow as his legal representative. The sale was held pending by a legatee in which his right to represent the deceased debtor was established. The court held that as the widow was also a legal representative of the deceased and as the legatee claimed the property as representing the deceased, his rights were not affected. This is true, but the legatee's suit was to establish a personal right, and could not operate as a lis pendens. The section expressly provides for all cases of decrees in a suit relating to immovable property, whether they involve a mortgage or a charge or recovery of possession. It makes no exception in favour of a bona fide transferee for value with-out notice.<sup>33</sup> The principle is of public policy, and no question of good faith arises.<sup>34</sup> An estoppel under s 41 cannot override the provisions of s 52.<sup>35</sup>

Section 52 is, of course, not attracted where a transfer is in pursuance of a document, and the decree is subject to the said document, as such a transfer does not affect the rights of any person under the decree.<sup>36</sup>

Section 52, however, does not make the transaction void. It merely makes any right created by it inoperative against the party to the suit.<sup>37</sup> The transfer is good and operative as between the parties thereto except to the extent that it might conflict with rights decreed under the decree or order.<sup>38</sup>

The purpose of s 52 is not to defeat any just and equitable claim, but only to subject them to the authority of the court which is dealing with the property to which claims are put forward.<sup>39</sup>

The Supreme Court repelling the contention that purchase pendente lite was void and conferred no title, has held that the words 'so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein', make it clear that the transfer is good except to the extent that it might conflict with rights decreed under the decree or order. The effect of s 52 is not to wipe such sale out altogether, but to subordinate it to the rights based on the decree in the suit. It is in this view that transfers pendente lite have been held to be valid and operative as between the parties thereto.<sup>40</sup> It appears that the decision of the Supreme Court in Nagubai's case was not noticed by a Full Bench of the Kerala High Court<sup>41</sup> when it held that the transfer of a suit property pendente lite was void as against the decree holder. The Orissa High Court has disagreed with this view expressed by the Full Bench of the Kerala High Court holding that a transferee pendente lite to the extent he has acquired interest from the defendant is vitally interested in the litigation and though the plaintiff is under no obligation to implead him, the court has discretion in the matter and an alienee would ordinarily be joined as a party to enable him to protect his interests.<sup>42</sup>

(18) Transfer before Suit

A transfer, including a mortgage,<sup>43</sup> before the suit is not subject to lis pendens.<sup>44</sup> In Umesh Chunder v Zahoor Fatima,<sup>45</sup> property was sold in execution of a decree of a prior mortgagee. The plaintiff claimed under puisne mortgages, executed, some before, and some after, the prior mortgagee's suit. He had not been made a party and sued to redeem the prior mortgagee. The Privy Council held that the right to redeem could be exercised only by virtue of the puisne mortgages executed before the suit. As to the puisne mortgages executed during the pendency of the suit, their Lordships said:

But if the transfer took place pendente lite, the transferee must take his interest subject to the incidents of the suit; and one of those is that a purchaser under the decree will get a good title against all persons whom the suit binds.

A deed of sale executed before the institution of a suit for specific performance of a prior contract for sale of the same property registered thereafter, cannot be held to have been executed pendente lite.<sup>46</sup> An agreement to sell executed in favour of a third party prior to filing of suit for specific performance of an oral agreement to sell would not be vitiated on ground of lis pendens.<sup>47</sup> A transfer by a person before he is made a party is not affected by the rule of lis pendens.<sup>48</sup> But a transfer by a person who is the legal representative of a deceased defendant in a pending suit made prior to his being substituted in the place of the deceased defendant is hit by the doctrine.<sup>49</sup> The transfer to which the provisions of this section apply is the creation of the mortgage itself, and not the subsequent sale in execution.<sup>50</sup>

Illustration

A makes a gift of land to B. C sues A for possession of the land. While this suit is pending, B transfers the land to D. A dies and C obtains a decree for possession against B as legal representative of A. Is D's title affected by the rule of lis pendens so as to be subject of C's decree? No, because (1) A's gift was before the suit; and (2) B was not a party to the suit at the time of the transfer by B to D.<sup>51</sup>

The onus of proving that the suit had been filed when the transfer took place is on the person invoking this section,<sup>52</sup> where the suit was filed on the very day the transfer took place, it must be shown that the plaint was filed earlier for there is no presumption that the plaint must have been filed during the earliest part of the day.<sup>53</sup>

Where a mortgage deed was existing prior to the suit, but sale deeds were drawn during the pendency of the suit, it was held that the mortgage would merge with the sale of suit land, and the transfer is not prior to the suit.<sup>54</sup>

Subsequent registration --

It matters not that the deed was registered after the suit, if the deed was executed before the filing of the suit.<sup>55</sup> This is because under s 47 of the Registration Act 1908, deed operates from date of execution, and not from date of registration.

(19) Right before Suit

When the rule is applied to a transfer pendente lite, it will not affect a right existing before the suit. If a puisne mortgagee sues for sale on his mortgage, the property will be sold subject to the rights of the prior mortgagee.<sup>56</sup> A sale in pursuance of a decree on a mortgage executed before the suit is not affected by lis pendens.<sup>57</sup>

Illustration

A mortgages property first to B, and then to C. C sues A on his mortgage and pending the suit A sells the property to B. The sale having been made pendente lite, is subject to the decree in C's suit. But A's right under his prior mortgage is not affected.<sup>58</sup>

A release by the vendee (during a suit for pre-emption) is affected by the rule of lis pendens, even though the sale be to the original vendor,<sup>59</sup> but if the purchaser has a superior right of pre-emption, that right will not be affected.<sup>60</sup> It had been held by the Allahabad High Court<sup>61</sup> that where the purchaser has an equal right of pre-emption, the proper procedure is to divide the property equally. The Lahore High Court had, however, held that the doctrine of lis pendens does not hit a purchase where the purchaser has an equal right of pre-emption;<sup>62</sup> and this view has been approved by the Supreme Court in Bishan Singh v Khazan Singh<sup>63</sup> as such a sale is a transfer in recognition of a pre-existing and subsisting right; the position would, of course, be different if the pre-existing right had become unenforceable by reason of its being time-barred for in such a case the transfer, though ostensibly made in recognition of such a right, infact created a new right pendente lite.<sup>64</sup>

A mortgagee who has an express power of sale within the intervention of the court does not lose his remedy on the mortgagor filing a suit for redemption.<sup>65</sup>

A mere agreement to sell is not sufficient to defeat the suit for another pre-emptor, and a sale executed after the institution of such a suit is bad on the ground of lis pendens.<sup>66</sup> Such an agreement does not defeat lis pendens; the observations of the Supreme Court in Bishan Singh v Khazan Singh<sup>67</sup> to pre-existing rights must be confined to rights of pre-emption.<sup>68</sup>

(20) Attachment before Suit

In Anundo Moyee v Dhonendro Chunder,<sup>69</sup> the defendant purchased property in execution of a money decree against the mortgagor while a suit for foreclosure was pending, but the Privy Council held that as the property had been attached in execution proceedings before the execution of the mortgage, the defendant held by title paramount, and was not affected by lis pendens. In this case, however, the property was in the mofussil and the decree was a decree for sale made by the Supreme Court at Calcutta in its equity jurisdiction, and as equity acts in personam the decree was in substance a decree that the parties should concur in conveying and selling the property to the purchaser. The court had no jurisdiction over the property and, therefore, the suit could not operate as a lis pendens. Otherwise the principle of Motilal v Karrabuldin<sup>70</sup> would have applied, for in that case it was held that an attachment before suit does not prevent the operation of the doctrine of lis pendens.

(21) Transfer after Suit

In Amrit Lal Jalan v Haryana Urban Development Authority,<sup>71</sup> the appellant's allotment was cancelled, and plot was resumed by the authority on 26 October 1984. The appeal was dismissed on 19 April 1985. Plot was, thereafter, allotted to a third party on 29 January 1986. In the above facts, it was held that the doctrine of lis pendens has no application.

(22) Section 52 Excludes Section 41

A purchaser pendente lite who makes improvements cannot, it is submitted, claim the benefit of s 52. The point was raised but not decided in Motichand v British India Corporation.<sup>72</sup> It was specifically held in a Punjab case that the alienee who is hit by s 52 cannot claim compensation for improvements made by him.<sup>73</sup>

(23) Indian Court

A suit in a foreign court cannot operate as a lis pendens.<sup>74</sup> The section does not apply, unless the suit is pending in a court exercising jurisdiction in India (excluding Jammu & Kashmir) or a court established outside India under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act 1947. The Privy Council is not a foreign court for it exercised jurisdiction in British India.<sup>75</sup> The court must also be a court having jurisdiction, ie, competency to try the suit.<sup>76</sup> A high court is empowered under the Letters Patent to try a suit for land in the mofussil if part of the land is within the local limits of its jurisdiction and leave of the court has been obtained. In such a case, a mortgage suit for land partly situated in the mofussil and filed in the high court will operate as a lis pendens.<sup>77</sup> But a suit on a mortgage of land in the mofussil tried in the Supreme Court of Calcutta in its equity jurisdiction, did not constitute a lis pendens, as the court had no jurisdiction over the land and its decree was in personam, and did not affect title to immovable property.<sup>78</sup> Similarly, when a Hindu widow gave a lease of land in the mofussil while an equity suit against her husband's executor was pending in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, the lease was not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens as the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction over land in the mofussil.<sup>79</sup> If the court had jurisdiction, it matters not that under s 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, the suit should have been filed in a court of lower grade.<sup>80</sup>

It has been held in a Madras case<sup>81</sup> that the section cannot apply to properties situated outside India.

(24) Movables

The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to movables.<sup>82</sup> If ornaments are pledged pending a suit for their recovery, the pledge does not take subject to the decree.<sup>83</sup> The provisions of this section cannot apply to standing timber which is not immovable property.<sup>84</sup>

(25) The right to Immovable Property must be Directly and Specifically in Question

It is of the essence of the rule of lis pendens that a right to immovable property is directly and specifically in question in the suit.<sup>85</sup> Therefore, when the dispute for money, where no property is in dispute, is referred to arbitration and an award is made creating a charge for payment of the amount and a judgment is passed on such an award, the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply.<sup>86</sup> Not only must the right to immovable property be directly and specifically in question in the suit, but the description of the property in the pleading must be sufficient to identify the property.<sup>87</sup> On the other hand, it is not sufficient to specify the property if the right to it is not directly in issue. Thus, when a Hindu widow sued her stepson for maintenance, and merely specified the item of property in his possession, it was held that the suit did not operate as lis pendens.<sup>88</sup> Where the widow not only specified the property, but claimed that her maintenance should be charged upon it, it was held that the suit did operate as lis pendens.<sup>89</sup> Though a charge under s 100 of the TP Act does not involve transfer of an interest to immovable property, it creates a right to immovable property for the purpose of executing the decree and a charge within the meaning of s 100, would attract the provisions of s 52.<sup>90</sup>

The doctrine is not applicable in favour of a third party. Where the only point which arises for decision in the suit was whether a deed of settlement was true or false, it cannot be said that any right to immovable property was in question, and, therefore, s 52 cannot apply. Nor can it be invoked by a party who was not a party to the suit.<sup>91</sup> A suit for a declaration of a charge upon specific immovable property falls within the purview of this section.<sup>92</sup>

The property transferred or dealt with must be property actually in litigation.<sup>93</sup> Thus, if A files a suit against B to establish a right of pre-emption in respect of a purchase by B of property X, and B during the pendency of the suit acquires property Y by gift from another co-sharer, and so himself becomes a co-sharer not liable to be pre-empted, no question of lis pendens can arise, for the property in suit has not been transferred.<sup>94</sup>

(i) Suit in which no right to immovable property is in question --

Suits in which no right to immovable property is in question are outside the scope of the section. Such suits are suits for debt or damages where the claim is limited to a money demand,<sup>95</sup> or a suit for the recovery of specific movables;<sup>96</sup> or a suit for an account;<sup>97</sup> or a suit for rent of an agricultural holding;<sup>98</sup> or an application for a personal decree under o 34, r 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, when the net sale proceeds are insufficient to satisfy the mortgage decree.<sup>99</sup> A transfer of immovable property during a suit for debt or damages may, however, be attacked under s 53 as a fraud on creditors. A sues B for debt. During the pendency of the suit B makes a gift of his immovable property to C in order to put it out of the reach of A and other creditors. The transfer by gift is not subject to lis pendens, but it may be attacked as a fraud on creditors under s 53.

(ii) Suit for maintenance --

A suit by a Hindu wife for maintenance against her husband is ordinarily a personal suit, and any purchaser of the family property during the pendency of the suit is not affected by the rule of lis pendens.<sup>1</sup> But the doctrine of lis pendens does apply to a suit for maintenance by a Hindu widow in which she claims to have her maintenance made a charge on specific immovable property and a decree is passed creating a charge on such property, for in such a case, a right to immovable property is directly and specifically in question.<sup>2</sup> The doctrine also applies to a suit by a Hindu wife for maintenance if a charge is claimed on specific immovable property.<sup>3</sup> The property would, of course, be different where no charge is claimed in the plaint at all.<sup>4</sup> When a decree creating a charge for maintenance remains unsatisfied, the purchaser of the property charged is bound by lis pendens.<sup>5</sup>

(iii) Creditor's suit against heirs --

A creditor's suit against an heir in his representative capacity to recover a debt out of the assets of a deceased debtor does not create a charge so as to affect with lis pendens a mortgage of the heir.<sup>6</sup> A transfer pending a suit by a Mahomedan woman for dower claiming a charge on her husband's property generally is not affected by lis pendens.<sup>7</sup> This is because the specific property transferred is not in suit. However, a transfer by an heir pending an administration suit by a Mahomedan widow to recover her dower debt out of immovable property left by her husband and her share in his estate is affected by lis pendens, if a decree is passed in the suit creating a charge on the property for payment of the dower.<sup>8</sup>

(iv) Administration suit --

A suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased person may be brought by a creditor, or an heir, or a residuary legatee under the will of the deceased. The suit again may be brought against an heir in possession of the estate or against the executor or administrator of the estate of the deceased. The general rule as regards administration suits was thus stated by the Privy Council in Cutterput Singh v Maharaj Bahadoor.<sup>9</sup>

When the estate of a deceased person is under administration by the court or out of court, a purchaser from a residuary legatee or heir buys subject to any disposition which had been or may be made of the deceased's estate in due course of the administration. In fact, the right of the residuary legatee or heir is only to share in the ultimate residue which may remain for final distribution after the liabilities of the estate, including the expenses of administration, have been satisfied.

The above passage was quoted by the High Court of Calcutta<sup>10</sup> in an administration suit by a creditor against the heirs of the deceased, of which the facts are stated in illust (1) below.

As to administration suits against an executor or administrator, the rule followed by the High Court of Rangoon<sup>11</sup> was as follows:

Where a creditor or one of the next-of-kin institutes an administration action against an executor or administrator, the mere institution of the action or obtaining of mere administration decree does not ordinarily deprive the executor or administrator of the general power to dispose off assets, unless and until the plaintiff has obtained an order appointing a receiver of the estate or at least an injunction restraining the executor or administrator from exercising the powers vested in the executor or administrator.

A transfer, therefore, by an executor or an administrator pending the suit, had been held not to be subject to the rule of lis pendens. If the case is governed by s 307 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, the administrator may not transfer any immovable property without the previous permission of the court by which the letters of administration were granted; a transfer without such permission is voidable under the same section at the instance of any other person interested in the property.<sup>12</sup> Chutterput Singh v Maharaj Bahadoor, mentioned above, was applied by the Judicial Committee in a later case.<sup>13</sup> The suit in that case was to ascertain and administer the trust under a deed. A decree was passed in the suit declaring one of the parties as entitled to a one-sixth share in the surplus income, and that the trustees should have their costs out of the trust property. The beneficiary thereupon mortgaged his share. Under a later order in the suit, part of the property was sold to realise the trustees' costs. It was held that the mortgagee's rights were subject to the sale, and the mortgage was consequently not an encumbrance upon the title of the purchaser. In delivering the judgment of the Board, Viscount Summer said:

The principle laid down in Chutterput Singh v Maharaj Bahadoor applies equally to the suit now in question as to the case of a suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, which was the matter then before their Lordships.

- (1) A lends money to B on a pledge of jewels. B dies intestate leaving three sons. A sues the sons for repayment of the loan, for sale of the jewels, and, if necessary, for administration of B's estate. In April 1919, a decree is passed for sale of the jewels with liberty to apply for an administration order in case there is a deficit on the sale. The jewels are sold and there is a deficit. A applies for an administration order. On 2 July 1920, a preliminary decree is made for the administration of the estate. During the pendency of the suit, some of the properties forming part of B's estate are mortgaged by his sons. The mortgages subsequent to 2 July 1920 are subject to lis pendens. The mortgages before that date are not subject to lis pendens. As to these mortgages, the court said that a transfer of property could not be subject to the rule of lis pendens, unless the specific property was mentioned in the pleadings and the right to such property was directly and specifically in question, and that these conditions were not present in the case. The court also observed that it could not be said merely because there was a general prayer, that if it became necessary an order for administration should be made that there was a right to immovable property directly and specifically in question in the suit.<sup>14</sup>
- (2) A, an heir of the intestate, filed a general administration suit against another heir in possession of the estate, and the court made a preliminary decree for the administration of the estate. So far there was no lis pendens. But in the course of proceedings before the Commissioner, a plot of land in the possession of B was claimed as a part of the estate and the Commissioner reported in favour of the claim. After the report, B sold the land. The sale was subject to lis pendens as the Commissioner's report put the right to the land specifically in question.<sup>15</sup>

(v) Suit for cancellation of the deed of trust --

A suit for the cancellation of a deed of trust and for reconveyance of the immovable property specified in the deed is within the rule of lis pendens,<sup>16</sup> but a suit in which the only question was whether a deed of settlement was true or false, is not a suit within the rule.<sup>17</sup>

(vi) Suit for specific performance --

The rule of lis pendens is applicable to suits for specific performance of contracts to transfer immovable property.<sup>18</sup> Section 52 of the TP Act is not subject to s 19(b) of the Specific Relief Act 1963, which provides that specific performance of contract cannot be enforced against the transferee for value, who has paid his money in good faith, without notice of the original contract. The subsequent transferee, even though he may have obtained the transfer without notice of the original contract, cannot set up, against the agreement holder any right defeating the rule of lis pendens, which is founded upon public policy.<sup>19</sup>

In case of a transfer hit by the doctrine of lis pendens, the question of good faith which is essential to be established before an equitable relief can be granted in favour of a subsequent vendee under s 41 or s 51 of the TP Act, is totally irrelevant.<sup>20</sup>

A was in possession of land as tenant of B. But B on 8 February 1907, agreed to grant a permanent lease of the same land to C. C sued for specific performance of the agreement of lease, and while this suit was pending against him, B sold the land to A. The suit was decreed and C's title as permanent lessee related back to 8 February 1907. The sale to A was subject to C's decree, and C as assignee of the reversion was entitled to recover rent from A from that date.<sup>21</sup>

(vii) Suit on mortgage --

The rule applies to suits on mortgages;<sup>22</sup> but a suit which is based on a mortgage and in which a money decree is given, is not as long as the decree stands unreversed, a suit in which a right to immovable property is directly and specifically in question.<sup>23</sup> A lessee from a mortgagor during the pendency of a suit to enforce the mortgage is not entitled to resist the claim for possession of the auction purchaser at the sale in execution of the decree on the mortgage.<sup>24</sup> He can, however, apply to be joined as a party to the suit, and ask for an opportunity to redeem the property; if he does not, he cannot resist the claim of the auction-purchaser.<sup>25</sup> However, where the Agra Tenancy Act 1926 applies, he can only be evicted under the provisions of that Act.<sup>26</sup> A payment of rent by a lessee to a mortgagor on a lease granted pending the mortgagee's suit to enforce the mortgage is not binding on the mortgagee.<sup>27</sup> A puisne mortgagee who purchases the equity of redemption during the pendency of foreclosure proceedings by a prior mortgagee is affected by lis pendens. If he does not redeem the prior mortgagee, the foreclosure decree may be executed against him.<sup>28</sup> In a case before the TP Act, an application to file an award directing the sale of mortgaged property was held to operate as a lis pendens.<sup>29</sup>

A suit to enforce contribution to a mortgage debt under s 82 of TP Act constitutes a lis pendens and the purchaser of the property pending the suit will be subject to the right of contribution decreed against it.<sup>30</sup>

(viii) Suit for partition -- A partition suit operates as lis pendens with the result that the purchaser of an undivided share pending the suit takes only that property which is allotted on partition to his vendor.<sup>31</sup> A contrary decision in Calcutta, proceeds on an erroneous view of the word 'contentious'.<sup>32</sup> In that case, two defendants granted a lease for seven years of one of the properties pending a suit for partition and the plaintiff to whom the property was allotted by the decree was held to be bound by the lease. This was erroneous and contrary to the principle that any dealing with the property during the pendency of the suit should be without prejudice to the rights of the parties. In a later case, the Calcutta High Court held that if co-sharers mortgage their interests pending a partition suit, the mortgage is subject to, and the purchaser at the sale under the mortgage will be bound by all the proceedings in the partition suit.<sup>33</sup> Again, in another case,<sup>34</sup> the same high court applied the rule of lis pendens to a partition suit. A member of an undivided Hindu family consisting of six sons and a mother governed by the Bengal school, sued for partition. One of the sons sold his share to a stranger during the pendency of the suit. On partition, the mother's inchoate right to a share ripened into an absolute right and the vendee was, therefore, entitled only to a seventh share. The mother's right accrues only when the property is partitioned. Therefore, when a mortgagee obtained a preliminary decree for sale before the partition suit was filed, and then purchased the property, the purchase was of the interest of all the parties and the mother could not claim a share, for no partition had been effected.<sup>35</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that execution of batai patra during the pendency of suit for partition would not confer any rights as it is hit by the principles of lis pendens.<sup>36</sup> Private sale of family property by a karta, pending a suit for partition instituted by a member, is hit by s 52 and does not bind the family.<sup>37</sup> When A mortgages property pending a partition suit between him and B, the mortgage was effective as to the share allotted to A, but void as to the share allotted to B.<sup>38</sup>

(ix) Suit for pre-emption --

A suit for pre-emption involves a right to specific immovable property and is, therefore, within the section.<sup>39</sup> No dealing with the property after a pre-emption suit has been filed can affect the rights of the plaintiff.<sup>40</sup>

Illustration

A sells land to B in respect of which C has a right of pre-emption. C files a suit to pre-empt the land, against A and B. A week after the institution of the suit, B re-sells the land to A, and files a written statement that C has no cause of action. The re-sale was pendente lite and could not affect C's rights. C's suit was decreed.<sup>41</sup>

The customary right of pre-emption, according to the decisions of the Allahabad High Court,<sup>42</sup> must subsist upto the date of the decree, and this rule received statutory recognition in s 19 of the Agra Pre-emption Act 1922. Accordingly, an acquisition by the defendant by gift, during a pre-emption suit, of a share in the mahal will defeat the plaintiff pre-emptor's suit.<sup>43</sup> In Hans Nath v Ragho Prasad,<sup>44</sup> the Privy Council pointed out that the doctrine of lis pendens is limited to a dealing with the immovable property actually in suit and, therefore, does not apply to the acquisition by a party of a different property to establish a status of co-sharer not liable to be pre-empted. The Agra Pre-emption Act 1922 was amended by Uttar Pradesh Act of 1929, s 5 of which enacts that a right of pre-emption cannot be defeated by a gift subsequent to the suit.

Where a plaintiff files a pre-emption suit against the defendant and, while that suit was pending, B, who had an equal right of pre-emption as the plaintiff, files a pre-emption suit against the same defendant and the latter suit is compromised, the validity of the compromise decree in favour of B is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens, since B had an equal right with the plaintiff.<sup>45</sup>

(x) Suit for rent --

A suit for rent is primarily a suit for money, and does not constitute a lis pendens for no right to immovable property is directly and specially in question.<sup>46</sup> This is so even when, as between a zamindar, a patnidar and a darpardidar, the decree for rent is a charge on the property. For, a suit for rent cannot be regarded as a suit to claim a charge on specific property.<sup>47</sup> A purchase made during the pendency of execution proceedings in a suit for arrears of rent is not affected by the rule of lis pendens.<sup>48</sup>

(xi) Award proceedings --

Where a private award creates a charge for maintenance, the presentation of an application to file the award must be regarded as a plaint, and the commencement of a lis pendens.<sup>49</sup> Res judicata prevails over the doctrine of lis pendens and once a judgment is pronounced by a competent court in regard to the subject-matter of the suit to which the doctrine of lis pendens applies, that is res judicata and binds not only the parties thereto, but the transferee pendente lite.<sup>50</sup>

(xii) Suit on an unregistered agreement --

Where in a suit on an agreement, seeking specific performance and alternatively a charge on the property in question, a compromise decree providing in substance for the relief of charge is passed, the decree comes within the expression 'any decree or order, which may be made therein' and the fact that the plaintiffs by the terms of the compromise relinquished their rights under the agreement could not lead to a different conclusion. In the same case, the Privy Council also remarked that the broad purpose of this section is to maintain the status quo unaffected by the act of any party to the litigation pending its determination. The applicability of the section cannot depend on matters of proof or strength or weakness of the case on one side or the other in bona fide proceedings. Further, nothing can depend on the question whether a suit was based on a registered or unregistered agreement.

(xiii) Easement suit --

The section applies to a decree which relates to easements.<sup>51</sup>

(26) Suit for Injunction

Where the suit initially was only for an injunction and before it was converted into one for specific performance, the suit property was sold, it was held that the provisions of s 52 could be invoked by the plaintiff who even in the suit as it was initially filed claimed that there was a valid sale agreement in his favour and, therefore, the right to the disputed property was directly and specifically in question.<sup>52</sup>

(27) Lease by a Mortgagor

As already stated, a lease from a mortgagor, on a lease granted pending the mortgagee's suit for sale, is not entitled to resist a claim for possession by the auction purchaser at the court sale.<sup>53</sup> In some cases it has been held that yearly leases by a mortgagor in possession are not within the rule as they are not prejudicial to the mortgagee's security.<sup>54</sup> A mortgagor in possession has now a statutory power to lease under s 65A and a lease granted by a mortgagor under this statutory power pending a suit by the mortgagee would be subject to the rules of lis pendens, for otherwise it would convert the mortgagee's estate into one expectant on the term created by the lease.<sup>55</sup>

It is held that s 52 and s 65-A of the TP Act operate in different spheres. Section 52 deals with the cases of transfer or anything otherwise dealing with any immovable property after any suit or proceeding in which any right to such immovable property is directly and specifically in question, has been filed. Section 65-A deals with the powers of the mortgagor to grant a lease of the mortgaged property, while the mortgagor remains in lawful possession of the same. Section 65-A is not made subject to the provisions contained in s 52 of the TP Act. If, however, the mortgagor grants a lease during the pendency of a suit for sale by the mortgagee, the lessee is bound by the result of the litigation.<sup>56</sup> If a mortgagor in possession executes a lease of the property in the ordinary course of management as the agent or bailee of the mortgagee during the pendency of a suit by the mortgagee to enforce the mortgage, a question may arise whether such a lease is in the eye of law a lease granted by the mortgagee through his agent and, therefore, binding on him. This question was left open by the Supreme Court in the two undernoted cases.<sup>57</sup>

However, where it was found that such rights could not be affected, it was held that the lease was not invalid.<sup>58</sup> In Anaji Thamaji Patil v RB Patil,<sup>59</sup> a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has, in effect, overruled Ramdas Popatlal v Fakira Pandu<sup>60</sup> and held that s 52 prevails over s 65-A. The court, however, held that a simple mortgagee has no right to possession, his rights are not affected by a lease granted by the mortgagor, and such a lease, if granted, pending a suit by the mortgagee, is not hit by s 52.

(28) Misdescription

A misdescription of the land in the pleadings will prevent the operation of the doctrine of lis pendens,<sup>61</sup> but not if despite misdescription, the land is sufficiently identified.<sup>62</sup> An alienee who is aware of the identity of the property will be affected by lis pendens despite the misdescription.<sup>63</sup>

(29) Transferred or Otherwise Dealt with

The word 'transferred' refers to sales, mortgages, leases and exchanges. But the meaning of the words 'otherwise dealt with' is not so clear. They would probably include such transactions as a release or a surrender.<sup>64</sup> They have been held to include a contract of sale,<sup>65</sup> a partition between co-defendants,<sup>66</sup> and the putting up of constructions.<sup>67</sup> They also include the handing over of possession,<sup>68</sup> but not, according to the Punjab High Court, the forcible taking of possession.<sup>69</sup> They also apply to any collusive decree,<sup>70</sup> or compromise<sup>71</sup> by which the title of a party is affected during the pendency of a suit, for the principle underlying the section is that a litigating party is exempted from taking notice of a title acquired during the litigation. The principle of the section has even been applied when in execution of a decree for an injunction to remove an obstruction to a passage, it is found that another obstruction has also been erected after the suit was filed. This other obstruction was also removed in execution, so that the plaintiff should not be compelled to file another suit.<sup>72</sup> An adoption, however, stands on a different footing and cannot be treated as a dealing with property pendente lite.<sup>73</sup> An admission before a Sub-Registrar of execution of a sale deed is not a dealing with property.<sup>74</sup>

The Supreme Court had held that the act of taking illegal possession of property, or the continuance of wrongful possession of property does not amount to 'otherwise dealing with the property' so as to attract s 52, even if the wrong-doer be a party to the suit.<sup>75</sup>

An extinction of title is also not hit by the doctrine simply because such extinction is during the pendency of the suit. An extinction of title which takes place by an application of the specific and mandatory provisions of the Limitation Act 1963 falls outside the scope of s 52. It would not be governed by the provisions of the TP Act relating to 'transfer' defined by s 3, but by the Limitation Act 1963 exclusively.<sup>76</sup>

(30) Involuntary Alienations--Court Sales

Section 52 is limited by s 2(d), and, strictly speaking, does not apply to court sales. Some old cases do so limit the application of the rule.<sup>77</sup> However, it is now settled law that though the section itself may not apply to involuntary alienations, the principle of lis pendens applies to such alienation. This is the effect of three Privy Council cases,<sup>78</sup> which have been approved and followed by the Supreme Court.<sup>79</sup> That was also the view adopted in a large number of high court cases.<sup>80</sup>

The doctrine of lis pendens applies to involuntary sales. Merely because a holder of a decree for money is not, as such, a party to a decree in a maintenance suit creating a charge for maintenance on the disputed property; he cannot claim that he is not bound by the decree passed in the suit in which a charge had been prayed for. The decree holder for money cannot contend that he was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, and the court sale in his favour cannot prevail over the court sale in favour of the purchaser under the maintenance decree.<sup>81</sup> The principle of the doctrine of lis pendens applies to involuntary sales held for the recovery of revenue demands.<sup>82</sup> The provisions of s 52 do not apply to an execution sale, but the principle of lis pendens applies. The Allahabad High Court has so held,<sup>83</sup> following a Supreme Court decision.<sup>84</sup> The High Court of Punjab and Haryana has, however, held that the doctrine of lis pendens is not applicable where the transfer is not by an act of the parties, but by an order of the Collector under the Redemption of Mortgages (Punjab) Act 1913. The court points out that the definition of 'transfer of property' in s 5 is confined to an act of a party, and does not cover a statutory order.<sup>85</sup>

During the pendency of a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain property, the property was purchased by an auction purchaser in the execution of a decree in a suit filed on the basis of a promissory note. The execution sale, it was held, would be hit by the principle of lis pendens embodied in s 52, and s 2(d) would not exclude the applicability of s 52. The sale was ab initio hit by s 52. Confirmation of the sale by the court could not make the sale valid, and no title could be given to the person in whose favour the sale was confirmed.<sup>86</sup>

However, the doctrine cannot be applied as between parties to suit who are arrayed on the same side, and between whom there is no dispute to be adjudicated upon. It is the duty of the auction purchaser or the decree holder to specify the interest of the judgment-debtor in the property in the sale proceedings. Until this is done, the doctrine cannot be invoked in court sale proceedings;<sup>87</sup> but in a sale by the Official Receiver of the property of the insolvent in a private sale and is governed by s 52.<sup>88</sup>

D then sues A for rent, but as D 's purchase was during the pendency of B 's suit A is entitled to show that this tenancy has merged in his higher title as proprietor.<sup>90</sup>

Sales for recovery of taxes --

As to sales for the recovery of land revenue or other taxes, there is a conflict of decisions. Sales for the recovery of land revenue under s 13 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, Bengal Act 11 of 1859, have been held to be subject to the rule of lis pendens,<sup>91</sup> and the Patna High Court has said that there is no distinction between execution sales, and sales for the realisation of government revenue.<sup>92</sup> On the other hand, the view of the Rangoon High Court is that it would be a dangerous extension of the doctrine to apply it to sales for the recovery of government taxes and local rates.<sup>93</sup> The Madras High Court has applied lis pendens to sales for the recovery of income tax<sup>94</sup> and abkari dues,<sup>95</sup> but not to revenue sales which enforce a paramount claim of the Crown.<sup>96</sup> The Bombay High Court has applied the rule to a sale of the property of an absconding offender under s 88 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898.<sup>97</sup> The Travancore & Cochin High Court has, however, held that the principle underlying the section is applicable to involuntary sales; it does not apply to revenue sales for arrears of land revenue or other dues which constitute a first charge on the property.<sup>98</sup>

If property is sold for arrears of government revenue while proceedings in the execution of a money decree are pending, the rule cannot apply, for no right to immovable property is in issue in the suit.<sup>99</sup> In Jayaram Mudaliar v Ayyaswami<sup>1</sup> CJ Sikri concurring, held that s 52 applies to revenue sales. The effect of the section would, however, depend upon the provisions of law under which a sale is held. Section 52 does not affect pre-existing rights. As such tax laws confer a charge on the property, a purchaser at a revenue sale would not be affected by lis pendens.

Insolvency --

The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply when the defendant becomes insolvent during the pendency of a suit and the estate vests in the Official Assignee or Official Receiver, as the case may be. In such a case there is no transfer.<sup>2</sup> So also, in a case when there is a devolution of property in favour of the official receiver under s 28(2) of the Provincial Insolvency Act.<sup>3</sup> The Official Assignee must be joined as a party under o 22, r 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure, otherwise he is not bound.<sup>4</sup>

Attachment --

An attachment creates no lien or charge on the property attached, and so an execution purchaser who buys the property after the suit is filed is not protected merely because he had attached the property before the suit was filed.<sup>5</sup>

Revenue proceeding --

A revenue officer acting under the Central Provinces Tenancy Act is a Revenue Court and the proceedings under s 82B of the Act operates as lis pendens.<sup>6</sup>

Sale to protected tenant --

It has been held by a single Judge of the Bombay High Court<sup>7</sup> that a sale to a protected tenant under the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act 1948, is not affected by lis pendens on the ground that such a sale is involuntary, sed quaere.

(31) Lis Pendens in the Same Suit

In a case from Bombay,<sup>8</sup> CJ Jenkins said that the doctrine 'does not defeat a purchaser under a decree or order for sale when the lis pendens is the very suit in which that decree or order is passed.' In that case, a house which belonged to a joint family consisting of an adult and two minors was mortgaged by the adult member. The mortgagee got a decree for sale against all three and sold the house while an appeal by the minor members was pending. The Court of Appeal dismissed the suit as against the minors holding that their interests were not affected. Nevertheless, the court held that the auction purchaser was not affected by lis pendens, and dissented from a judgment of J Phear.<sup>9</sup> This is on the principle that bona fide purchase at sales by a court having jurisdiction are not affected by a subsequent reversal of the decision.<sup>10</sup> It is on the same principle that restitution cannot be ordered under s 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 against a bona fide purchaser for value at a sale held by a court having jurisdiction.<sup>11</sup> In a Calcutta case,<sup>12</sup> a darpattidar filed a suit to prevent a court sale of a putni. The Privy Council held that the putni was not saleable; but before that decision was given, the putni had been sold. The court held that as the lis pendens was a different suit to that in which the sale had been ordered, the doctrine applied, and the sale was set aside.

(32) Authority of the Court

A transfer during the pendency of the suit may be authorized by the court, and the sanction of the court will exclude it from the rule of lis pendens. The section must be of the court in which the suit is pending.<sup>13</sup>

(33) Sale under O 21, R 83 of Code of Civil Procedure 1908 Lis pendens does not apply to sales under this rule.<sup>14</sup>

(34) Lis pendens in the Code of Civil Procedure 1908

Claim in Execution Proceedings

The rule of lis pendens is recognised in o 21, r 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which does not allow a transferee pendente lite of the judgment-debtor to make a claim in execution proceedings. But this bar will not apply if the transferee has a title to possession irrespective of his purchase. This occurs when the purchaser pendente lite is subrogated to the rights of a usufructuary mortgagee by redemption of a usufructuary mortgage of a date before the suit.<sup>15</sup> A transferee pendente lite is a representative in interest of the party from whom he got the transfer. Such a transferee is not entitled to raise any claim against the decree or order that may ultimately be passed in the action.<sup>16</sup>

Right of transferee pendente lite to be made a party in proceedings

The Supreme Court in Sarvinder Singh v Dalip Singh<sup>17</sup> has held that since the alienation pendente lite is hit by the doctrine of lis pendens by operation of s 52, alienee cannot be considered to be either a necessary or proper party to the suit. In Dhurander Prasad Singh v Jai Prakash University,<sup>18</sup> which was later followed in Bibi Zubaida Khatoon v

Nabi Hassan Saheb,<sup>19</sup> the Supreme Court has held: 'Where a party does not ask for leave, he takes the obvious risk that the suit may not be properly conducted by the plaintiff on record, yet he will be bound by the result of the litigation even though he is not represented at the hearing unless it is shown that the litigation was not properly conducted by the original party or he colluded with the adversary.'

Under o 22, r 10, an alienee pendente lite may be joined as party, unless permitting impleadment and recognising the alienation/assignment would amount to defeating the ends of justice and the prevalent public policy.<sup>20</sup> The plaintiff is not bound to make him a party;<sup>21</sup> and the alienee has no absolute right to be joined as a party.<sup>22</sup> But the court has a discretion in the matter which must be judicially exercised,<sup>23</sup> and an alienee will ordinarily be joined as a party to enable him to protect his interest.<sup>24</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that a transferee of property, who purchased property during the pendency of suit, and who was entitled to be, but was not brought on record under o 22, r 10 in a pending suit, is entitled to prefer an appeal against the decree or order passed therein, if his assignor could have filed such an appeal in view of s 146, Code of Civil Procedure 1908.<sup>25</sup> Further, a lis pendens transferee, though not brought on record under o 22, r 10, is entitled to move an application under o 9, r 13 to set aside a decree passed against his transferor, the defendant in a suit.<sup>26</sup>

When an assignee pendente lite is joined as a party, the suit is not a new suit, but the same suit continues by or against him and if he is made a party in an appeal, he cannot raise any defence which his assignor could not have put forward.<sup>27</sup> He, further, cannot take a stand contrary to the one taken by his predecessor-in-interest.<sup>28</sup>

After the decree, the transferee pendente lite, if not joined as a party, is under s 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, a representative of the judgment debtor in all matters relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree.<sup>29</sup> In a Bombay case,<sup>30</sup> the plaintiff obtained a decree for partition against his brother, who, however, sold part of the property which was the subject of the suit pendente lite. The purchasers were not made parties to the suit, and after the decree the plaintiff filed a fresh suit against the purchasers to recover possession of his share. The court held that the purchasers were not entitled to plead s 47 as a bar to a second suit by the decree-holder, and that s 52 forbid their doing so. In another Bombay case,<sup>31</sup> the decree was for a personal injunction restraining the judgment debtor from interfering with the rights of the decree-holder as owner of an immovable property. The rule of law is that the decree-holder cannot execute the decree against a purchaser from the judgment debtor as an injunction does not run with the land.<sup>32</sup> Nevertheless, the court in execution proceedings granted an injunction against the purchaser as he was a purchaser pendente lite. Transferee pendente lite can be added as proper party, if his interest in the subject matter of the suit is substantial.<sup>33</sup>

(35) Estoppel

A party may be estopped from raising the plea of lis pendens. A, in execution of a decree against B, brought B's property to sale and purchased it. At B's instance the sale was set aside. A filed an appeal against the order setting aside the sale, and pending the appeal B sold the property to C. C deposited the amount of the decree in court. A withdrew this amount in full satisfaction of his decree. A having elected to take the money was estopped from pleading that the sale to C was subject to lis pendens.<sup>34</sup> Having taken the money he could no longer claim the land. This is on the principle that when a litigant has two remedies which are alternative, his adoption of one bars the other.<sup>35</sup>

(36) Res Judicata

The rule of res judicata prevents the owner from dealing during lis pendens and once a judgment is pronounced by a competent court in regard to the subject-matter of the suit in which the doctrine of lis pendens applies, the decision is res judicata and binds not only the parties to the suit, but the transferee pendente lite.<sup>36</sup>

(37) Lis Pendens and Temporary Injunction

Notwithstanding the rule of lis pendens in s 52 of TP Act, there can be occasion for the grant of injunction restraining pendente lite transfers in a fit and proper case. Thus, in a suit for specific performance of sale of the property, if the defendant is not restrained by an injunction from selling the property to a third party and accordingly, the third party purchases the same bona fide for value without any notice of the pending litigation and spends a huge sum for the improvement thereof or for construction thereon, the equity in his favour may intervene to persuade the court to decline, in its discretion, the equitable relief of specific performance to the plaintiff and to award damages only.<sup>37</sup>

In a Delhi case, the defendant entered into an agreement to sell and received a sum of Rs 21,000/- as advance, the plaintiff contended that a decree of specific performance of the said agreement be passed and till such time the final decision is taken in the suit, the defendant should be restrained by an order not to sell, alienate or create any third party interest in the property, as in that case the plaintiff will suffer an irreparable injury. The court declined to grant an injunction against the defendant, and instead, passed an order that in case the defendant intends to transfer, alienate or create third party interest in the property, the intending purchaser /transferee shall be informed in writing about the pendency of this suit.<sup>38</sup>

- (1) Every transfer of immovable property made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor shall be voidable at the option of any creditor so defeated or delayed.

Nothing in this sub-section shall impair the rights of a transferee in good faith and for consideration.

Nothing in this sub-section shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to insolvency.

A suit instituted by a creditor (which term includes a decree-holder whether he has or has not applied for execution of his decree) to avoid a transfer on the ground that it has been made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transfer or shall be instituted on behalf of, or for the benefit of, all the creditors.

- (2) Every transfer of immovable property made without consideration with intent to defraud a subsequent transferee shall be voidable at the option of such transferee.

For the purposes of this sub-section, no transfer made without consideration shall be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud by reason only that a subsequent transfer for consideration was made.

(1) Amendment

This section was Amended by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) Applicable as rule of Justice, Equity and Good Conscience

The principle of s 53 has been adopted in the Punjab where the TP Act was not in force,<sup>39</sup> and was also followed in Bombay before the TP Act was extended to that Presidency.<sup>40</sup> It has, however, been held that the requirement that any suit filed to set aside a fraudulent transfer must be a representative suit, will not be insisted upon in Punjab as that is a mere technicality.<sup>41</sup>

(3) Transfer

The transfers referred to in this section are transfers binding between the parties, but voidable in the circumstances stated in the section.<sup>42</sup> A document made to defeat or to delay his creditors is binding on the executant, and those claiming under him.<sup>43</sup> The transfer is valid until it is set aside, and must not be confused with benami or colourable transfers which are merely sham transfers, and not meant to operate between the parties.<sup>44</sup> In the collusive or benami transactions there is no transfer, but the property is merely put in a false name, and generally for the purpose of defrauding creditors. As observed by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Mina Kumari v Bijoy Singh,<sup>45</sup> the difference is distinct though it is often flurred.<sup>46</sup> Such colourable or sham deeds do not require to be set aside,<sup>47</sup> for the real title is all along with the transferor.<sup>48</sup> They are outside the scope of the section.<sup>49</sup> It is relevant to note that a contention that the transaction is a sham and nominal transaction, and that the property was never conveyed at all, and remained the property of the original owner, may go even contrary to the contentions raised that are based upon s 53 of the TP Act. If the contention that it is a sham and nominal transaction is accepted, s 53 may not have any application. Infact, the challenge based on s 53 involves the admission that the transfer is a real one.<sup>50</sup>

The judgment debtor got his self acquired land secretly mutated in favour of a son without any document of title. It was held the transfer is not valid, and the son of the judgement debtor cannot raise any objection to attachment of such property in execution of a decree.<sup>51</sup> Thus, where a donor has not divested himself of his ownership, and the gift has not been completed, the rule of lis pendens does not apply.<sup>52</sup> Where the plaint itself disclosed that the sale transaction was fictitious and designed to defeat the plaintiffs' creditors, the defendant being a party to that design, it was held that both parties being in pari delicto neither of them could be permitted to take advantage of such a fraudulent transaction.<sup>53</sup>

Collusive Award and Decree --

The principle of the section has been extended to a collusive award and decree,<sup>54</sup> even though s 2(d) excludes transfers by the operation of law from the scope of the TP Act.<sup>55</sup> The Lahore High Court has applied the principle of s 53 to a collusive award and decree as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience, though the TP Act is not in force in Punjab, on the ground that s 2(d) was a technical provision which did not bind the courts in Punjab.<sup>56</sup>

Deed of appointment --

The exercise of a power of appointment under a settlement is a voluntary transfer, and the appointment will be set aside if made for the purpose of delaying or defeating creditors.<sup>57</sup>

Marriage settlement --

A marriage settlement made to defeat and defraud, creditors is voidable under this section.<sup>58</sup>

Partition --

This section has been applied to cases of partition.<sup>59</sup> The correctness of these decisions was a question canvassed before the Supreme Court in Sarin v Poplai,<sup>60</sup> but the Supreme Court declined to go into the question. The correct view, it is submitted, is that a partition is not a transfer,<sup>61</sup> and, therefore, not strictly within the section, but that the principle of the section applies to a fraudulent partition. Where the object of the transfer is not merely to give a sharer his rightful share in the family property, but to effect the partition in such a way that such sharer would be able to defeat the creditors, as for instance, to allot to him properties which the creditors would not be able to touch and which he would be able to keep for himself, it is clearly a transaction which fulfils the requirements of this section.<sup>62</sup> A reference to arbitration which led to an award and decree for partition by which the father received an allowance in lieu of his share in the family property, was held not to be voidable under this section as there were no debts in existence at the time of the reference, and as the object was not to defeat creditors, but to safeguard the interests of a minor son.<sup>63</sup> A partition which does not provide for the payment of a Hindu father's debt is mala fide, and may be avoided by a creditor in proceedings in execution of a decree against the father.<sup>64</sup> Similarly, in a partition in which no property was allotted to the father who was indebted, it was held that the partition was illusory, although the sons were directed to pay the father's debts.<sup>65</sup> Where there is partition in a joint Hindu family or a release deed by an indebted coparcener, s 53 is attracted, if the object of the allotment of share to such coparcener is to help him defeat his creditors. Even assuming that partition in a Hindu family and release deed by a coparcener in respect of his share does not amount to a 'transfer' within the meaning of s 5 and, therefore, is not within the purview of s 53, the principle of the section can be invoked. If the object of a given instrument of a partition or a release deed is not to give a sharer his rightful share in the family properties, but to effect a partition in such a way that such a sharer would be able to defeat the creditors, it would amount to a fraudulent partition.

Where the value of the share paid to the indebted coparcener, on his effecting a release of the share, is so meagre that he would be hardly able to pay about 25 per cent of his total debts, that one circumstance alone would be sufficient to establish that the intention was not merely to release his share in the interest of the suit property, but to defeat and delay the creditors.<sup>66</sup> However, a partition of joint family property between a Hindu father and his son is not voidable under s 53, even if it is made to avoid attachment by a creditor of the father,<sup>67</sup> there is nothing fraudulent in the son exercising his right of partition to save his share of the property.<sup>68</sup>

Partnership --

Under the Statute of Elizabeth, an assignment by an outgoing partner of his share to the continuing partner in consideration of a covenant for the payment of the partnership debts when both the partners, and the firm, were insolvent was set aside as calculated to delay the creditors, both of the partners and of the firm.<sup>69</sup> It has, however, been held by the Punjab High Court that a deed of dissolution was not a transfer within the meaning of this section.<sup>70</sup>

Relinquishment --

A relinquishment by one coparcener in favour of another cannot be said to be a transfer within the meaning of this section;<sup>71</sup> unless it is found to be a device to evade creditors.<sup>72</sup>

Surrender --

A surrender of a life-estate has been held to be transfer within the meaning of this section.<sup>73</sup>

Waqf --

A deed of waqf executed as a device to put property out of the reach of creditors has been held to be a transfer to which this section applies, the court observing that s 53 does not infringe any rule of Mahomedan law, for under that law no person can make a waqf of his entire property without making arrangements for the payment of his debts.<sup>74</sup> In such a case, it is immaterial that the transfer is valid under Mahomedan law.<sup>75</sup> It is open to a debtor to prefer one or more creditors over the others in the payment of his debts, and so long as he retains no benefit in the property, the mere circumstance that some creditors stand paid while others remain unpaid, does not attract the provisions of s 53.

Where it was found that the sale of the assets of the company was effected for the purpose of discharging the debts payable by the company and that the consideration was not inadequate, it is immaterial that the transfer was effected in favour of a person who was not a creditor.<sup>76</sup>

A debtor can prefer one creditor over others in the payment of his debts. So long as he retains no benefit in the property, the mere circumstance that some creditors stand paid while others remain unpaid, does not invalidate the transfer. Sale of assets by a company for adequate consideration is not invalid merely because it is in favour of a non-creditor.<sup>77</sup>

(4) Movable Property

The section does not apply to movable property,<sup>78</sup> but the principle of the section was extended to a case of an assignment of a decree when a considerable part of the consideration was secretly reserved for the benefit of the assignor.<sup>79</sup> The Statute of Elizabeth, 13 Eliz, c 5, included movable property, and the principle of that statute was applied to a transfer of movable property by the Privy Council;<sup>80</sup> and the Rangoon High Court has applied the section as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience to the transfer of movables.<sup>81</sup>

(5) Voidable

As stated above, the section does not refer to benami transfers, ie, to transfers that are colourable or void. The transfers referred to in the section are transfers in fraud of creditors which are valid until they are avoided, and which are voidable at the option of any creditor defrauded, defeated or delayed. If the creditor sues to avoid the transfer, he must file a representative suit on behalf of all the creditors. However, he may manifest an intention to avoid the transaction otherwise than by filing a suit, eg by attaching the property transferred. Accordingly, in a Madras case<sup>82</sup> CJ Wallis said:

I am of opinion that it is open to the judgment-creditor by virtue of s 53 of the Transfer of Property Act to attach as the property of the judgment-debtor, property which has been fraudulently transferred to the claimant with intent to defeat or delay creditors. If he knows of the transfer when he applies for attachment, the application is sufficient evidence of his intention to avoid it; if he only hears of the transfer when a claim petition is preferred under O 21, r 58, and still maintains his right to attach, that again is a sufficient exercise of his option to avoid.

In a case from Allahabad,<sup>83</sup> a creditor sued to recover his debt from his debtor and joined as parties persons to whom the debtor had transferred his property by gift, but claimed no relief against the donees and they were 'exempted' from the suit. In execution of his decree against the debtor, he attached the property transferred. The donees objected to the attachment and the court held that the creditor was barred by o 2, r 2, and by the principle of res judicata from pleading that the gift was voidable under s 53. The court said, that the creditor had the option of accepting the transaction or avoiding it--once he decided to do one thing he lost the other option, and could not be allowed to reprobate what he had approbated.

(6) Sham Transfers

A document executed nominally with a view to staying off creditors, with the express understanding that the properties sold would be reconveyed after the pressure of the creditors had subsided, is a sham transaction, the consideration also being inadequate. Such a sale creates no equities in favour of the vendees, while setting aside the sale.<sup>84</sup> A sham and fictitious transfer is no transfer at all, and need not be set aside under s 53.<sup>85</sup>

(7) Extent

There is no equity in favour of a party to a fraud and the whole transfer is voidable, and not merely as to the excess. A transaction which is intended to defeat or delay creditors cannot be good in part, and bad in part.<sup>86</sup> The only exception is where the transferee utilises the consideration paid for the discharge of a prior encumbrance, and so becomes entitled by subrogation.<sup>87</sup> Where the transfer is not voidable as a fraud on creditors, but is only a preference to one creditor, effect will be given to the deed to the extent to which it is supported by consideration.<sup>88</sup>

(8) Creditors

The term 'creditor' is correlative to debtor, and signifies a person to whom a debt, that is a liquidated, or specific sum of money is due. In its ordinary acceptation, the term implies a person who has lent money or sold goods to another which has remained unpaid. It includes not only those who have proved their claim and obtained a decree and are designated judgment-creditors, but also ordinary creditors who have still a claim to prove.<sup>89</sup> A Mahomedan wife is a creditor in respect of her dower debt,<sup>90</sup> and a genuine gift by a Mahomedan to his wife in lieu of dower, even if it is a preference over other creditors, is not hit by the section;<sup>91</sup> and so is a deserted Hindu wife in her claim for maintenance.<sup>92</sup> However, a Hindu wife is not a creditor if she is not entitled to separate maintenance.<sup>93</sup> A person claiming only an unliquidated sum for damages for tort or breach of contract is not a creditor. An auction-purchaser who is not a decree-holder would not be a creditor entitled to take the benefit of the section.<sup>94</sup> A subscriber to a 'chitty' agreement, on entering into the chitty agreement, does not incur a 'debt' for the amount of all the future instalments, and in respect of such amount there is no 'debtor-creditor' relationship. Neither the prizing of the chitty, nor the execution of the security bond, would give rise to a debt. The prize amount is not received as a 'loan', but is received as of right by virtue of the terms of the contract between the parties. Therefore, no 'debt' due to the foreman arises by reason of the receipt of the prize amount, or of the execution of the security bond for securing future subscriptions.

Execution of a mortgage by the subscriber in favour of the foreman of a 'chitty' is not sufficient to treat the amount under the security bond as a 'debt'.<sup>95</sup>

(9) At the Option of the Creditors so Defeated

Where a co-sharer transfers his share to his wife who sues for partition thereof, the other co-sharer defendants cannot raise the plea that the transfer was a sham transaction intended to defraud his creditors.<sup>96</sup> The motive of putting the property out of the reach of the creditors does not by itself make the transaction a sham one. As far as the parties are concerned, it is a perfectly valid and binding contract.<sup>97</sup> It is only open to the creditors to bring a suit for avoiding the sale.<sup>98</sup> However, where a decree-holder entitled to avoid a transfer of property elects to do so by bringing the property to sale in execution of the decree, that avoidance enures for the benefit of the auction purchaser, even though he is not himself a creditor or a transferee.<sup>99</sup>

(10) Subsequent Creditors

The term 'creditor' includes not only creditors at the time of the assignment, but also those who subsequently become creditors.<sup>1</sup> A man who contemplates going into trade cannot on the eve of his doing so, take the bulk of his property out of the reach of those who may become his creditors.<sup>2</sup> However, a voluntary settlement made bona fide by a person who has ample means outside it to pay his present debts, is not void because it is found afterwards to defeat or delay future creditors.<sup>3</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A man of extravagant and dissolute habits was persuaded to reform and make a settlement of his property on his wife and children. He subsequently relapsed and incurred debts. The settlement was held not to be voidable by the subsequent creditors.<sup>4</sup>

- (2) A obtained a decree against B for the possession of certain properties and mesne profits estimated at Rs 10,000. B, a month later, executed a deed of trust settling all the property of which he was then possessed on his wife and children. The settlement was voidable under s 53.<sup>5</sup>

The distinction between the two illustrations is--in the first, the settlor was not in debt at the time of the settlement and the creditors were subsequent creditors, while in the second, the settlor was in embarrassed circumstances at the time of the settlement, and the present creditor was defeated.

(11) Defeat or Delay Creditors

This section says 'creditors' and not 'creditor.' The intention must be to defeat or delay creditors generally, and not to prefer one creditor to another.<sup>6</sup> The meaning of the statute is that the debtor must not retain a benefit for himself. It has no regard whatever to the question of preference or priority amongst the creditors of the debtor. This was followed by the Privy Council in Musahar Sahu v Hakim Lal,<sup>7</sup> where the following passage occurs in the judgment of Lord Wrenbury:

As a matter of law, their Lordships take it to be clear that in a case in which no consideration of the law of bankruptcy applies, there is nothing to prevent a debtor paying one creditor in full and leaving others unpaid although the result may be that the rest of his assets will be insufficient to provide for the payment of the rest of his debts. The law is, in their Lordships' opinion rightly stated by CB Palles, in Re Moroney,<sup>8</sup> where he says:

The right of the creditors taken as a whole is that all the property of the debtor should be applied in payment of demands of them or some of them, without any portion of it being parted with or without consideration reserved or retained by the debtor to their prejudice. Now, it follows from this, that security given by a debtor to one creditor upon a portion of or upon all his property (although the effect of it, or even the intent of the debtor in making it, may be to defeat an expected execution of another creditor) is not a fraud within the statute; because notwithstanding such an act, the entire property remains available for the creditors, or some or one of them, and as the statute gives no right of ratable distribution, the right of the creditors by such act is not invaded, or affected. The transfer which defeats or delays creditors is not an instrument which prefers one creditor to another but an instrument, which removes property from the creditors to the benefit of the debtor. The debtor must not retain a benefit for himself. He may pay one creditor and leave another unpaid; Middleton v Pollock.<sup>9</sup> As soon as it is found that the transfer here impeached, was made for adequate consideration in satisfaction of genuine debts and without reservation of any benefit to the debtor, it follows that no ground for impeaching it lies in the fact that the plaintiff who also was a creditor was a loser by payment being made to this preferred creditor--there being in the case no question of bankruptcy.

This case is now the leading case in India on the question of preference, and the facts of it are sufficiently remarkable, for the debtor filed an affidavit that he did not intend to transfer his properties, and nevertheless transferred them during the pendency of the suit to another creditor in satisfaction of another debt. The first creditor was grossly deceived, but his case was not within the section, for, as Sir Lawrence Jenkins said in delivering the judgment of the Board in Mina Kumari v Bijoy Singh:<sup>10</sup>

A debtor, for all that is contained in s 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, may pay his debts in any order he pleases and prefer any creditor he chooses.

A debtor may, therefore, convey property to any creditor in satisfaction of the debt due to him even though the transfer is effected to avoid an impending execution by another creditor.<sup>11</sup>

A was a creditor of B, and in December 1900 filed a suit to recover his debt. During the pendency of the suit in January 1901, he applied for an attachment before judgment of certain properties of B. In February, B filed an affidavit that he had no intention of alienating his properties, and the application of A was accordingly dismissed. Nevertheless, in September, B sold the properties to another creditor. The sale defeated A, but as it was for adequate consideration and in satisfaction of a genuine debt, and as the debtor reserved no benefit for himself, it was a case of one creditor being preferred to the detriment of another, and the sale was not voidable under s 53.<sup>12</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that the fact that a debtor wishes to prefer one creditor does not lead to the inference that the intention was to defeat the creditors. In this case, there was in issue a deed of settlement and the allegation was that the deed was executed to evade the payment of sales tax, but there was no sales tax order against the author of the settlement.<sup>13</sup>

Even in a case before the TP Act, the Allahabad High Court held that a genuine sale for a good and valid consideration to one creditor, even if effected to defeat and delay another creditor, apart from cases in which either insolvency or bankruptcy is invoked, is not voidable.<sup>14</sup> In order that a transaction may fall under s 53, the person alleging so must clearly establish an intention to defeat or delay the creditors generally, and not merely an intention of preferring some creditors to others. The transfer must be such as to remove the property from the creditors, to the benefit of the debtor. There must be a fraudulent intention to defeat or delay the creditors, which has to be found. As a man is presumed to intend the normal and ordinary consequences of his acts, the intention with reference to a particular act resulting in a transaction, should also be adjudged only from the consequences of that act, and in the background of the surrounding circumstances. The transferee must share the fraudulent intent and must actively aid and assist the transferor in carrying out his intention of securing cash to himself to the detriment of the creditors.<sup>15</sup>

Undue preference in insolvency, is dealt with in s 54, Provincial Insolvency Act 1920 and s 56, Presidency Town Insolvency Act 1904. A fraudulent transfer under s 53 must be distinguished from a fraudulent preference under insolvency laws. A sale effected to discharge other debts payable by the debtor-transferor is not necessarily fraudulent. Ordinarily, in the race between the creditors, he who lags behind could not complain against him who proceeded fast and succeeded in getting at the property of the debtor. Even the fact that the transferee was not a creditor would make no difference.<sup>16</sup>

If the debtor sells property to another creditor to discharge the debt due to him and the price realised is considerably in excess of the debt discharged;<sup>17</sup> or if a fictitious debt is included in the consideration;<sup>18</sup> this would be evidence of an intent to defraud creditors generally. In the case of a fictitious debt, the money is retained by the transferee for the benefit of the debtor. Again, if more property is sold than is necessary, the conversion of land into cash enables the debtor to keep property out of the reach of the creditors.<sup>19</sup> Mere inadequacy of the consideration may not by itself be sufficient to make the transaction voidable.<sup>20</sup>

Illustration

A , a trader at Jubbulpore, was in embarrassed circumstances. He purchased a stamp paper at Agra and secretly executed a usufructuary mortgage of all his property to his uncle B , the consideration being a fictitious book debt. One of the terms of the mortgage was that B should out of the usufruct pay allowances to the wife and children of A . The mortgage was voidable under s 53, for it put all of A 's property out of the reach of his creditors and reserved a benefit for A . Moreover, the secrecy with which the transaction was effected was evidence of fraudulent intention.<sup>21</sup>

The question whether a transfer was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors is a mixed question of law and fact, and an erroneous view of the law will vitiate a finding of fact.<sup>22</sup> In a Madras case,<sup>23</sup> the lower court had found that the husband had sold property in order to defeat his wife's claim for arrears of maintenance. On appeal, it was urged that there was other property sufficient to satisfy the wife's claim. The high court said that in view of the finding of the lower court, it was unnecessary to consider this contention. It is submitted that this is incorrect, and that the high court should have considered all the facts and decided the issue as one of law. In another case,<sup>24</sup> it was said that the court should consider whether the other property of the debtor was of sufficient amount and easily available. The Supreme Court has held that where a transfer is effected to defeat or delay creditors, the fact that only a portion of the transferor's property is transferred is immaterial, 'unless there is cogent proof that there is other property left sufficient in value and of easy availability to render the alienation in question immaterial for the creditors'.<sup>25</sup>

If there is no question of preference, an intention to defeat creditors generally may be inferred from an intention to defeat a particular creditor.<sup>26</sup>

(12) Title Disputed

In an Allahabad case, an objection under o 21, r 58, Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (as it stood before 1976) was raised by the judgment-debtor's wife, on the ground that her husband had gifted the disputed property in her favour and that, therefore, the property was not the husband's property. On the objection being accepted, the creditor brought a suit to set aside the order. A defence was raised that under s 53, the suit was not maintainable, as it had not been filed on behalf of all the creditors. The plea was rejected; the suit was maintainable, since the wife's case was that the property no longer belonged to the husband. There was no allegation about an intention to defeat creditors and hence, s 53 did not come into play.<sup>27</sup>

(13) No Presumption of Fraud

Under the general law, if creditors sue to avoid a transfer the burden of proving that it is a fraud on the creditors rests on them.<sup>28</sup> As pointed out by the Privy Council in Mina Kumari v Bijoy Singh,<sup>29</sup> however, suspicious a transaction may be, the court's decision must rest not upon suspicion, but on legal grounds established by legal testimony.<sup>30</sup> The burden initially lies on the creditors to make out a case under this section. However, when they have proved facts which are sufficient to show prima facie that the intention of the debtor was to defeat or delay the creditors, it is for the debtor to meet the case, and to explain the facts.<sup>31</sup>

The present section leaves the question of intention to be determined according to the general law of evidence. However, according to that law, a man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts, and fraud must necessarily be proved by circumstantial evidence.<sup>32</sup> Therefore, even under the new section, it would be evidence of a fraudulent intention if a debtor made a voluntary settlement, or a transfer for a grossly inadequate consideration without reserving sufficient property for the payment of his debts; so also, if he put all his property out of the reach of those who might become his creditors before embarking on a hazardous enterprise. However, every such case would depend upon its own circumstances, and in all cases it is a question of fact whether the transaction is bona fide or a contrivance to defraud creditors.<sup>33</sup> The mere fact that a transfer is made without consideration, as in the case of a gift, will not necessarily lead to an inference that the transfer was made with the intention of defrauding creditors.<sup>34</sup>

The facts which militate against the bona fides of a transaction and whose cumulative effect is proof of fraud are many and various. Secrecy is a badge of fraud,<sup>35</sup> while notoriety rebuts a presumption of fraud.<sup>36</sup> A gift by a Hindu father of ancestral property to his grandchildren, with the assent of the son who had received consideration by payment of his debts, though made to screen the property from subsequent creditors, is not fraudulent. The Privy Council said:

That it was intended to save the ancestral property from being wasted by the vices and extravagance of Udey Narain (the son) is openly avowed on the face of the deed. But such an intention is not fraudulent. It may be carried into effect by honest means. And people who mean to effect such a design by fraud are not likely to put it in the forefront of an instrument which must be registered, which may easily be discovered by persons interested to inquire about the property, and to which attention is, likely to be drawn by the consequent mutation of names after public notice and a change of management.<sup>37</sup>

It is some evidence of fraud that a time-barred debt is set up as part of the consideration for the transfer; but though this is an element to be taken into consideration, it is not so strongly suggestive of fraud as the fact that the debt never existed.<sup>38</sup> It is evidence of a fraudulent intention that the transferor is in embarrassed circumstances, and the transaction is between relations,<sup>39</sup> or members of a small community,<sup>40</sup> or that the transfer was a mere cloak for retaining a benefit for the transferor.<sup>41</sup> A transaction which is a cloak under which the transferor retains a benefit for himself is assailable,

<sup>42</sup> unless it is found on consideration of all the surrounding circumstances that such benefit is small.<sup>43</sup> However, these are all facts to be considered along with other circumstances of the case.<sup>44</sup> The mere fact that debts are due from the transferor is not also sufficient to establish a fraudulent intention.<sup>45</sup> In Muthiah Chetti v Palaniappa Chetti,<sup>46</sup> the Privy Council held that a mortgage executed by a debtor to a relation in discharge of bona fide debts was a piece of family policy not contrary to law, although it was effected during the pendency of a suit by another creditor. Where there were no present debts, a sale to a daughter was upheld against subsequent creditors, and payment of consideration was presumed.<sup>47</sup>

- (1) Where there was a sale of a partnership which was in embarrassed circumstances, the Supreme Court held that s 53 applied because the firm was financially embarrassed, and because the transferee belonged to the same small community as the vendor, and must have known the circumstances of the vendors, because the transfer was registered at Madras, though the property was situated at Vizagapattam, and because no evidence was led to the purpose of the transfer.<sup>48</sup>
- (2) A sued B for debt. B obtained an adjournment and during the adjournment sold her land to her sister C. B allowed the suit to be decreed ex parte and when A attached the land C objected that it was hers. B professed to have sold the land to raise money to pay a debt but no demand had been made for payment of the debt and B was not solely liable for its payment. The sale was held to be voidable as in fraud of creditors.<sup>49</sup>
- (3) A creditor had obtained a decree against a widow who has a life-interest in property left to her by her husband. The widow in order to put the property out of the reach of the creditor surrendered her interest to her son. The surrender was voidable under this section.<sup>50</sup>
- (4) A being in embarrassed circumstances wished to convert his property into cash so as to conceal it from his creditors. B being aware of A's object assisted him by purchasing the property. The sale was voidable under this section.<sup>51</sup>

(14) Transferee in Good Faith and for Consideration

The meaning of the second para of sub-s (1) is that if a person acquires property for value and in good faith, that is without being a party to any design on the part of the transferor to defeat or delay creditors, his rights will not be affected by the section, although the transferor's intention may have been fraudulent.<sup>52</sup> In a judgment approved by the Privy Council,<sup>53</sup> the Madras High Court said that under s 5 of the TP Act, good faith as well as consideration is made, in terms, as an essential condition for the validity of the transfer. The judgment quotes a passage from Twyne's case,<sup>54</sup> where Lord Coke said 'a good consideration doth not suffice if it be not also bona fide.' There are many Indian decisions to the same effect.<sup>55</sup> If the transferee is aware of the fraudulent intention of the transferor and aids and abets it, the transfer is voidable.<sup>56</sup> The knowledge and intention of the transferee are the determining factors.<sup>57</sup> If the vendor's intention was to convert his immovable property into cash so as to put it out of the reach of his creditors, and the vendee was aware of that intention, the sale would be voidable although the consideration was paid.<sup>58</sup> However, if the vendee was not a party to the fraud the sale would be valid,<sup>59</sup> even if the vendee were aware of an impending execution.<sup>60</sup> A debtor created a charge on two houses for the maintenance of his son's wife in pursuance of an antenuptial agreement. But although the evidence showed that his intention was to defraud his creditors, the charge was not set aside as there was no proof that his daughter-in-law was a party to the fraud.<sup>61</sup> However, in a case where the wife was a party to the fraud and the celebration of the marriage was part of a scheme to protect the property against creditors, the consideration of marriage was held to be insufficient to support the settlement.<sup>62</sup> In a case from Allahabad,<sup>63</sup> the first wife of a Mahomedan filed a suit for dower. Five days later, the husband transferred his property to his second wife for her dower. The court said that the transfer was voidable if the second wife combined with her husband with the improper object of defeating the first wife's claim. It is submitted, however, that the second wife was a creditor for her dower, and that her primary object must have been to secure her own dower, and the case was merely one of preference.

A preference of one creditor to another, even though fraudulent in the law of bankruptcy, is not fraudulent under this section. A creditor is a transferee in good faith if the transfer is made in satisfaction of his debt even though he is aware that proceedings have been taken by another creditor for the recovery of his debt, for his primary object is to protect himself, and not to defeat other creditors.<sup>64</sup> Therefore, if a transfer is to a creditor in satisfaction of a pre-existing debt, no question of good faith arises.<sup>65</sup> Good faith is not defined in the TP Act; and the definition in s 3(22) of the General Clauses Act 1897, does not apply as the TP Act was enacted in 1882. That definition provides that a thing shall be deemed to be done in good faith where it is in fact done honestly, irrespective of whether it is done negligently. An honest blunderer or stupid man who fails to make the usual inquiries is still acting in good faith, unless it is found that the failure to make inquiries was deliberately done to avoid discovering circumstances indicating fraud which are suspected to exist.<sup>66</sup>

A transferee who has constructive notice of a fraud is not a transferee in good faith. In a Madras case,<sup>67</sup> the creditor A had obtained a decree against his debtor B, and attached B's property. B had previously sold the property to C, who preferred an objection to the attachment which was allowed. C then sold it to D who purchased on the faith of the order allowing C's objection. A filed a suit and obtained a declaration that the sale to C was in fraud of creditors. The court also held that D was not a transferee in good faith. He had seen the order of C's objection which showed that title would be decided in the suit which A was to file; and yet he made no inquiry of A.

It appears from the case last cited that the protection extends to an innocent purchaser from a transferee who was a party to a fraud on creditors. Where a man in debt executed a deed of gift of his furniture in favour of his wife, who a fortnight after a creditor's decree, granted a bill of sale of the furniture in favour of a person who took for value and without notice, the court held that though the wife's title was subject to defeasance on a creditor's suit under Statute of Elizabeth, 13 Eliz, c 5 as being a fraud on creditors, yet the title of the bona fide purchaser for value under the bill of sale was a valid one.<sup>68</sup> There is an apparently contrary decision in Allahabad;<sup>69</sup> but in that case the original transfer was collusive and fictitious so that there was no title to convey to the second transferee. In a subsequent Allahabad case,<sup>70</sup> the creditor was held to be estopped, as his omission to impeach the first transfer enabled the transferee to make a second transfer.

(15) Onus

The onus of proving want of good faith in the transferee is on the creditor who impugns the transaction.<sup>71</sup> But if fraud is established, the onus of proving his good faith is shifted to the transferee.<sup>72</sup> The issues in a suit to set aside a sale under s 53 are, therefore,--

- (1) was the transfer made with intent to defeat and delay creditors;
- (2) if so, was the purchaser a transferee in good faith and for consideration.

The onus of proving the first issue lies on the creditors; and if that be established the onus of proving the second issue will be on the transferee.<sup>73</sup>

Under s 53, the burden of proof is on the person who alleges fraud, and mere suspicion is not sufficient to set aside the deed.<sup>74</sup>

If the transferee proves that he paid the fair value of the property, the court will lean towards holding that he acted bona fide.<sup>75</sup>

(16) Consideration

This word is used in the same sense as in the Indian Contract Act 1872 and, therefore, excludes natural love and affection. Transfers for natural love and affection are dealt with as transfers without consideration.<sup>76</sup> A time-barred debt is consideration under this section, but the inclusion of a time-barred debt in the consideration might be treated as some evidence of a fraudulent intention.<sup>77</sup> A dower debt is a valid consideration under this section.<sup>78</sup> In a curious case from Madras, a man who was heavily indebted transferred all this property to the children of his first wife in consideration of her relations allowing him to marry a second wife, and it was held that this was valid consideration, and that the transfer was not a fraud on creditors.<sup>79</sup>

If the debtor sells or mortgages his property, and the consideration stated is in excess of what is paid, or if the vendee or mortgagee is a creditor and the consideration stated is in excess of the debt, with an understanding that the excess is to be retained for the benefit of the debtor, and that the transaction is to be a shield against creditors, the sale or mortgage is voidable under this section.

A transfer by a Mahomedan husband in favour of his wife in payment of a deferred dower is a transfer for good consideration, and is not void.<sup>80</sup>

(17) Insolvency

The provisions of sub-s (i) saving the law of insolvency were inserted by the amending Act of 1929.

The object of the law of insolvency is to provide for an equal distribution of assets amongst the creditors, and its provisions are, therefore, more stringent. A preference to one creditor which would be valid under s 53 of the TP Act would, if the debtor were adjudged insolvent within three months, be deemed fraudulent under s 56 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act 1909, or s 54 of the Provincial Insolvency Act 1920. Similarly, a voluntary transfer may be set aside under those Acts if the transferor is adjudged insolvent within two years, although it may not offend against s 53 of the TP Act. Again, a transfer by a debtor of all his property to a particular creditor is not necessarily voidable under this section;<sup>81</sup> but under the Insolvency Acts it may operate as a fraudulent transfer or a fraudulent preference. The cases of fraudulent preference falling under the Insolvency Acts must be distinguished from those falling under this section.<sup>82</sup>

Illustration

A debtor owed money to a relation A, who, knowing that the debtor was insolvent and that another creditor B was pressing for payment required the debtor to secure his debt by a mortgage. This he was perfectly entitled to do for a preference to one creditor is not voidable under s 53 of the TP Act even though no assets are left for other creditors. But if the debtor had been adjudged insolvent within three months of the mortgage, the mortgage would have been voidable as against the Official Receiver.<sup>83</sup>

An assignment of all his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors is an act of insolvency on the part of the assignor.<sup>84</sup>

Insolvency courts have jurisdiction to decide questions of title both under s 7 of the Presidency-Towns Insolvency Act 1909, and under s 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act 1920. Hence, these courts have jurisdiction to decide whether a transaction is voidable under s 53 of the TP Act on an application made by the Official Assignee,<sup>85</sup> or the Official Receiver,<sup>86</sup> as the case may be. This jurisdiction is not exclusive, and in some cases the court of insolvency would decline to exercise jurisdiction, and leave the matter to be determined in a regular suit.<sup>87</sup> It has also been held that the insolvency courts are the only courts having jurisdiction to avoid a transfer in preference of a creditor or as not being a transfer in good faith and for value and executed within two years of the date of adjudication, and that no such question can be raised in a court of ordinary civil jurisdiction.<sup>88</sup> This, however, does not accord with English Law, and the correctness of these decisions is very doubtful.

(18) Creditor's Suit

A creditor's suit to avoid a transfer must be a suit on behalf of not only himself, but the whole body of creditors.<sup>89</sup> This is because the debtor might otherwise be exposed to a multiplicity of suits by each and every creditor. It has, however, been held that it is enough if the suit is in substance on behalf of all creditors even though it is not a representative suit as such.<sup>90</sup> A single creditor can, of course, file a suit if he is the only creditor.<sup>91</sup> The Calcutta High Court, has held that even a single creditor can file a suit under s 53.<sup>92</sup> A creditor may not approbate and reprobate, for if he has sought to make the transferee liable as a universal donee under s 128 of this TP Act, he may not afterwards impugn the gift as a gratuitous transfer with intent to defeat and delay creditors.<sup>93</sup> The fact that the creditors have been paid off since the date of the transfer is immaterial.<sup>94</sup>

English law allows a creditor if he can prove that he is a creditor to sue on his own behalf alone, and he may obtain an order declaring the deed void against creditors. However, the court will not give consequential directions for the satisfaction of his debt, unless he is in a position to levy execution against the property.<sup>95</sup> This exception has been followed in some Indian cases where an attachment of property has been discharged at the instance of a fraudulent transferee, and the decree-holder has been allowed to sue on his own account alone under o 21, r 63 of Code of Civil Procedure 1908 to establish his right to enforce his decree against the property.<sup>96</sup> The express direction in the fourth paragraph of the section has the effect of overruling these cases;<sup>97</sup> but this has been overlooked in some subsequent decisions.<sup>98</sup>

The representative suit would be under o 1, r 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the title of the suit would be--

AB on behalf of himself, and all other creditors of CD ..... Plaintiff

v

CD ..... Defendant

The decree would be in the form of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, schedule I, appendix D(13), declaring the transfer void as against the plaintiff and all other creditors, if any, of the defendant. The Privy Council have observed that an issue under s 53 cannot be raised and no decree for setting aside transfers under that section can be passed except in a suit property constituted for that purpose.<sup>99</sup>

It has been held in Punjab that this requirement is a technicality, and is not applicable in Punjab where the TP Act is not in force.<sup>1</sup>

However, although a creditor cannot sue on behalf of himself alone, yet, he is not obliged to defend a suit on behalf of the whole body of creditors.<sup>2</sup> The Madras High Court at one time took a different view.<sup>3</sup> The defendant creditor had attached property in execution of a decree for debt, but it had been fraudulently sold by the judgment-debtor to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's objection to the attachment was dismissed, and he then sued for a declaration of his title. The court held that the defendant could not resist the claim as he had failed to have the sale (which was voidable at his option) declared to be void. These cases were, however, overruled by a Full Bench of the same High Court in Ramaswami Chettiar v Malappa Reddiar,<sup>4</sup> where CJ Wallis explained that a transaction voidable at the option of a creditor may be avoided by an unequivocal declaration of an intention to avoid it, and that an attachment by a creditor was an exercise by him of his option to avoid the transfer; the learned judge held that s 53 may be pleaded as a personal defence by an attaching creditor, although he has not himself filed a representative suit to avoid the transfer, and this decision has been affirmed by the Supreme Court.<sup>5</sup> The amended s 53(1) does not refer to a defence to a suit and if a defence under s 53(1) could be raised by an attaching creditor defeated under the section, such a defence need not be in a representative capacity. There was nothing in s 53(1), as it originally stood, which precluded a defence by an attaching creditor to a suit to set aside a summary order under o 21o 21, r 63 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 that the sale in favour of the plaintiff is vitiated by fraud, and the amendment made no change in this matter.<sup>6</sup> Other high courts have also decided the point in the same way.<sup>7</sup>

B objects to the attachment and C maintains his right to attach and B's objection is dismissed. B then sues for a declaration of his right to the property. C may plead in defence that the transfer to B was in fraud of creditors.<sup>8</sup>

(19) Limitation

A creditor's suit to avoid the transaction does not affect the validity of the transaction as between the parties to it and so, art 91 of the Limitation Act 1908, which corresponds to art 59 of the Act of 1963 was held not applicable.<sup>9</sup> It has been held that the suit was governed by art 120 of the Act of 1908 which provided for a period of six years from the time when the right to sue accrued.<sup>10</sup> The article of the 1963 Act corresponding to art 120 is art 113 which, however, prescribes a limitation period of only three years. In a Madras case,<sup>11</sup> the judges differed as to whether the right to sue accrues when the creditor exercises the option to avoid the transaction, or when he becomes aware of the facts which entitle him to the relief. In Abdulla Khan v Purshottam,<sup>12</sup> the Bombay High Court held that the right to sue accrues to the plaintiff only when he decides to exercise the option given to him by s 53 to challenge the transfer, and to seek to recover his dues out of the property transferred.

The effect of the declaration under this section is that the transaction does not affect the creditor's right to recover their claims from the property transferred. The declaration still leaves the deed operative as between the parties, and does not amount to cancelling or setting aside the deed, because the creditors have no title or interest in the property to set aside the deed as between the parties thereto. Article 120 of the Limitation Act 1908, corresponding to art 113 of the Act of 1963, governs such a suit, and the time begins to run from the date on which the court makes the declaration.<sup>13</sup>

(20) Sub-section (2)--Subsequent Transferees

The second sub-section refers to the case when a subsequent transfer is in competition with a prior transfer without consideration. A bona fide transferee even from a fraudulent transferee is protected.<sup>14</sup> The voluntary transfer is not displaced unless it is fraudulent, and whether it is fraudulent is purely a question of fact. The subsequent transfer for consideration does not of itself create a presumption that the voluntary transfer which preceded it was fraudulent.

An auction purchaser at a court sale is a person who steps in by operation of law, and is not a subsequent transferee within the meaning of this section.<sup>15</sup>

Part performance

--Where any person contracts to transfer for consideration any immovable property by writing signed by him or on his behalf from which the terms necessary to constitute the transfer can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, and the transferee has, in part performance of the contract, taken possession of the property or any part thereof, or the transferee, being already in possession, continues in possession in part performance of the contract and has done some act in furtherance of the contract, and the transferee has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract, then, notwithstanding that [...]<sup>17</sup> where there is an instrument of transfer, that the transfer has not been completed in the manner prescribed therefore by the law for the time being in force, the transferor or any person claiming under him shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee and persons claiming under him any right in respect of the property of which the transferee has taken or continued in possession, other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract:

Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the rights of a transferee for consideration who has no notice of the contract or of the part performance thereof.

(1) History of the Section

This section was first enacted in 1929 by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 1929, and imports into India a modified form of the equity of part-performance as developed in England in Maddison v Alderson.<sup>18</sup> The enactment of the section sets at rest the considerable uncertainty prevailing in Indian law, as can be seen by three decisions of the Privy Council.<sup>19</sup> Recently, para 4 of s 53A has been amended by s 10 of the Registration and Other Related Laws (Amendment) Act 2001 (Act 48 of 2001) whereby the words 'the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or' has been omitted.

(2) Scope

So far applicability of s 53A of the TP Act is concerned, what is to be seen is that the section provides for a shield of protection to the proposed transferee to remain in possession against the original owner who has agreed to sell to the transferee, if the proposed transferee satisfies other conditions of s 53A. That protection is available as a shield, only against the transferor, the proposed vendor would disentitle him from disturbing the possession of the proposed transferees who are put in possession pursuant to such an agreement. However, that has nothing to do with the ownership of the proposed transferor who remains full owner of the lands till they are legally conveyed by a sale deed to the proposed transferees. Such a right to protect possession against the proposed vendor cannot be pressed in service against a third party like the state when it seeks to enforce the provisions of the Act against the tenure-holder.<sup>20</sup>

The following postulates are sine qua non for basing a claim on s 53A of the TP Act:

- (i) There must be a contract to transfer for consideration any immovable property.
- (ii) The contract must be in writing, signed by the transferor, or by someone on his behalf.
- (iii) The writing must be in such words from which the terms necessary to construe the transfer can be ascertained.

- (iv) The transferee must in part performance of the contract take possession of the property, or of any part thereof.
- (v) The transferee must have done some act in furtherance of the contract.
- (vi) The transferee must have performed or be willing to perform his part of the contract.<sup>21</sup>

In view of the amendment by the Amending Act of 2001, another requirement would be that the document containing contract for transfer of immovable property, if executed on or after the commencement of the Registration and Other Related Laws (Amendment) Act 2001, ie, 24 September 2001, has been registered.

A proposed vendee cannot protect his possession of the immovable property on the basis of an oral agreement. Written agreement is sine qua non for applicability of the equitable doctrine of part performance enshrined under s 53A.<sup>22</sup>

In the absence of the pleadings and evidence of all the essential conditions, making out a defence of part performance to protect possession claimed by the plaintiff, would not be attracted.<sup>23</sup> The plea under s 53A of the TP Act raises a mixed question of law and fact and, therefore, cannot be permitted to be urged for the first time at the stage of second appeal.<sup>24</sup>

(3) Amendment of Registration and Specific Relief Act

Amendment Act of 1929

The amending Act of 1929 did not merely partially introduce the equity of part-performance into Indian law by enacting s 53A, but also reinforced the position by amending the Registration Act 1908 and Specific Relief Act 1881.

Section 49 of the Registration Act 1908 which enacts that a document required to be registered, but not registered, shall not affect the immovable property comprised therein, or be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property, is amended, and a proviso is inserted to permit such a document being received in evidence in a suit for specific performance, or as evidence of part-performance of a contract for the purposes of s 53A of the TP Act.

This proviso made it clear that s 49 does not prevent an unregistered agreement or deed to be admitted in evidence as a contract.<sup>25</sup> It gave statutory recognition to Puchha Lal v Kunj Behari Lal,<sup>26</sup> and supersedes the decision in Sanjib Chandra v Santosh Kumar.<sup>27</sup>

Under the proviso, the unregistered document may be referred to as evidence that certain acts are done in performance of the agreement, for instance when a building has been erected in the terms of an unregistered lease.<sup>28</sup> However, a document which must be regarded as unregistered for fraud on registration cannot be referred to for invoking this section.<sup>29</sup>

Amending Act of 2001

The amendments made the amending Act of 1929, both under the TP Act as well as the Registration Act 1908, to even unregistered documents for the purpose of s 53A has now been withdrawn by the amendments made by the Registration and Other Related Laws (Amendment) Act 2001, which has come into force with effect from 24 September 2001. By this amending Act, as already noticed above, the words 'the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or,' as appearing in para 4 of s 53A has been omitted. Simultaneously, ss 17 and 49 of the Registration Act 1908 have been amended making it clear that unless the documents containing contract to transfer for consideration any immovable property for the purpose of s 53A is registered, it shall not have effect for the purposes of s 53A.<sup>30</sup>

Amendment in the Specific Relief Act

The amending Act also inserted a new section, s 27A, in the Specific Relief Act 1881, providing that a party may sue for the specific performance of a contract in writing to lease immovable property, even though it is not registered, if he has acted in part-performance of the agreement. This amendment was wider than s 53A, for the section enacts an equity which is only available as a defence. Section 27A of the Specific Relief Act, however, enacted an active equity, as in English law, sufficient to support an independent action by a plaintiff.<sup>31</sup> If a plaintiff was in possession under a lease (which would otherwise be inadmissible for want of registration), he could put the lease in evidence, and sue upon it for specific performance treating it as a contract, or to show the character and nature of the possession of the defendant.<sup>32</sup> Whether a contract could be specifically enforced was not a relevant factor in granting relief under this section.<sup>33</sup> Section 27A is not re-enacted in the Specific Relief Act 1963. Protection of s 53A would be available to the vendee till his suit for specific performance of contract is disposed off finally.<sup>34</sup> The amending Act of 2001 has not made any amendments in the Specific Relief Act 1963.

(4) Section 53A

The section has been described by the Privy Council,<sup>35</sup> and the Supreme Court,<sup>36</sup> as a partial importation of the English equitable doctrine of part performance. By virtue of this section, part performance does not give rise to an equity, as in England, but to a statutory right.<sup>37</sup> This right is more restricted than the English equity in two respects: (1) there must be a written contract; and (2) it is only available as a defence.<sup>38</sup>

So far as India is concerned, the section creates rights which were not in existence before the enactment was passed.<sup>39</sup> These rights to retain possession rest on the express provisions of the statute. It has been held that the doctrine of part performance is not applicable to the State of J & K.<sup>40</sup> Section 53A of the TP Act insists upon proof of some acts having been done in furtherance of the contract. The acts claimed to be in part performance must be unequivocally referable to the pre-existing contract, and point in the direction of the existence of contract. When a series of acts are done in performance, one such may be payment of consideration. Any one act by itself may or may not be of such a conclusive nature. The correct approach would be to look at the writing that is offered as a contract for transfer for consideration of any immovable property, and then examine the acts said to have been done in furtherance of the contract, and find out whether there is a real nexus between the contract and the acts pleaded as in part performance, to enable refusal of relief to be perpetuating the fraud of the party, who after having taken advantage or benefit of the contract, backs out and pleads non-registration as defence, a defence analogous to s 4 of the Statute of Frauds.<sup>41</sup>

(5) Applicability of Limitation Act

A perusal of s 53A shows that it does not forbid a defendant-transferee from taking a plea in his defence to protect his possession over the suit property obtained in part performance of a contract, even though the period of limitation for bringing a suit for specific performance has expired.<sup>42</sup> It also does not expressly provide that a defendant-transferee is not entitled to protect his possession over the suit property taken in part performance of the contract, if the period of limitation to bring a suit for specific performance has expired. The Supreme Court has held that since the period of limitation bars a suit for specific performance of a contract, if brought after the period of limitation, it is open to a defendant in a suit for recovery of possession brought by a transferor to take a plea in defence of part performance of the contract to protect his possession, though he may not be able to enforce that right through a suit or action.<sup>43</sup>

(6) Contracts to Transfer for Consideration

These words exclude gifts. A gift does not involve a contract, and even before the enactment of the section, it was held that the doctrine of part performance did not apply to gifts.<sup>44</sup> Moreover, a gift is complete on acceptance, subject to registration.<sup>45</sup> In a Calcutta case,<sup>46</sup> the doctrine was applied to an antenuptial gift; but the case was regarded as one of contract, the court treating the antenuptial promise of the bride's father as becoming a binding contract when the marriage followed.

The section applies to a contract of dower governed by Mahomedan law, where the bride is in possession and has married in performance of the contract.<sup>47</sup>

(7) Transfers and Agreements Covered by the Section

The section applies to leases and agreement to lease.<sup>48</sup> Where an agreement to lease is evidenced by correspondence, the lessee is put in possession, and there has been the acceptance of rent by the lessor for several years, the Supreme Court held that the section was applicable, and the lessee could defend the suit for ejectment.<sup>49</sup>

However, in a case from Delhi for the renewal of lease, oral negotiation were carried out between the parties. The draft lease was prepared, but was not signed by either of the parties. It was held that no concluded contract came into existence, and the suit for specific performance is not maintainable.<sup>50</sup> In another case, the court held that s 53A was not applicable to a lease agreement.<sup>51</sup> A lease of property being distinct from the transfer of property, s 53A is not applicable.<sup>52</sup>

It also applies to usufructuary mortgages, and mortgages with possession.<sup>53</sup> It does not, however, apply to a family arrangement, which does not involve a transfer of property,<sup>54</sup> or to a partition, which is not a transfer at all.<sup>55</sup> It is doubtful whether the section applies to an agreement to transfer a partial interest in property, such as a right to win minerals, or to cut timber.<sup>56</sup>

The mortgagee cannot claim a right higher than what is provided in the ultimate document agreed to be executed, by invoking s 53A. In the case of an agreement to execute a mortgage for a definite period under which possession was handed over to the defendant, if the conditions of s 53A are satisfied, he will be entitled to get all the rights under the mortgage which are agreed to be executed, but cannot claim to continue in possession after the expiry of that period relying on s 53A. The general law of mortgages or the rights and liabilities of the mortgagor and mortgagee are not modified by s 53A.<sup>57</sup>

(8) By Writing

As has been noted, the section only applies to a case where there is a written agreement. An oral agreement will not be sufficient.<sup>58</sup> There seem to be two reasons for this limitation: (1) The occasion for the doctrine arises in India with reference to documents inadmissible in evidence for want of registration; and (2) The risk of perjuries, if an oral contract could be set up as a defence after limitation for a suit for specific performance had expired. Mere oral agreement does not create any interest or charge. The equitable right of s 53A of the TP Act cannot be claimed for restraining sale of the suit property, but can be sought for seeking protection against dispossession.<sup>59</sup>

Though the contract must be in writing, its existence and its terms may, in appropriate cases, be proved by secondary evidence, as when the original is in the possession or power of the transferor.<sup>60</sup> It cannot, however, be proved from what purports to be its quotation in another document.<sup>61</sup> A writing which may refer to some part or parts of a contract which is oral, is not sufficient.<sup>62</sup> So also, a writing which referred by mistake to a different piece of land was held as not entitling a person to claim part performance.<sup>63</sup> It is, however, not necessary that there should be a formal agreement.<sup>64</sup> But when the terms of the agreement are reduced to a form of document, such document serves the purpose of this section.<sup>65</sup> An operative document incorporating a previous oral agreement is sufficient, even if it comes into existence later;<sup>66</sup> but a mere memorandum recording that possession was taken earlier under an oral agreement, is not.<sup>67</sup> A written agreement cannot, however, be relied upon if its material terms have been subsequently orally varied.<sup>68</sup> Where the recital indicating passing of possession was found to have been subsequently interpolated in the deed of agreement, it was held that the interpolation by which the plaintiff could claim part performance under s 53A of the TP Act was a material alteration, and the plaintiff could not, therefore, enforce his right under that agreement.<sup>69</sup>

(9) Signed by him or on his Behalf

The contract must be signed by or on behalf of the person sought to be charged under this section.<sup>70</sup> It follows, therefore, that a kabuliyat, signed only by the lessee, does not entitle him to relief under this section.<sup>71</sup> Where the lease deed, though registered, is not signed by the lessee, but possession had been delivered to the lessee, the lessee can claim the benefit of s 53A,<sup>72</sup> It had been held by the Madras,<sup>73</sup> and Andhra<sup>74</sup> High Courts that where such a contract was signed by another person as agent or karta of a joint family, a plea of part performance could not be taken against the members of the joint family, unless it was expressly stated to be on behalf of the joint family. This was erroneous and the decisions were criticised in earlier editions of this work. Both the decisions have been expressly overruled, the former by the Privy Council,<sup>75</sup> and the latter by a Full Bench of the Andhra High Court.<sup>76</sup> Where a contract is signed by a person, whose act would be binding on the real owner, the section applies.<sup>77</sup> It has also been held that these words must be liberally construed,<sup>78</sup> and such liberal construction is in accord with the English Law.<sup>79</sup> The position is, of course different, where A, who was part-owner of a property which had been leased by him to a firm of which he was a member, signed the contract not as part-owner but, as a member of the firm; the section could not be invoked against the other owner.<sup>80</sup>

In granting relief under s 53A, the question whether the contract is specifically enforceable has no bearing at all, and the doctrine of part performance applies even if specific performance is not otherwise permissible.<sup>81</sup>

(10) Any Movable Property

The doctrine as enacted in this section cannot apply to movable property.<sup>82</sup>

(11) Ascertained with Reasonable Certainty

A contract the terms of which cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty, cannot be enforced.<sup>83</sup> It is one of the necessary ingredients of s 53A that the terms of the written contract must be ascertainable with reasonable certainty. The emphasis on the word 'reasonable certainty' pre-supposes that the court should be in a position to judge the exact nature of the transaction, ie, the subject matter of the document. This is the foundational basis for s 53A, and in the absence of a document or a secondary evidence from which the court can ascertain the terms of that document with reasonable certainty, the defendants are not entitled to the benefit of the doctrine of part performance.<sup>84</sup>

(12) Taken or Continues in Possession

Section 53A applies to a person who contracts to transfer immovable property in writing. If the proposed transferee in the agreement has taken possession of the property or he continues in possession thereof being already in possession, part performance of the contract and has done some act in furtherance of the contract, and transferee has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract, the transferor shall be debarred from enforcing any right in respect of the property.<sup>85</sup>

The section only applies to cases where the transferee is in possession under a contract to transfer immovable property. Sine qua non for taking shelter under s 53A is proof of possession.<sup>86</sup> If the transferee has not taken possession, the section does not apply.<sup>87</sup> In a case where a person claims benefit of part performance, evidence that he was inducted into possession for the first time subsequent to the contract, would be a strong piece of evidence regarding the contract, and of possession changing hands pursuant to the contract. Continuous possession of a tenant in the suit property even after entering into the sale agreements would not by itself amount to a part-performance, putting the tenant in possession of the suit properties pursuant to the sale agreements.<sup>88</sup>

It is not necessary that the delivery of the possession must be at the instance of the vendor. The words used in the section are 'and the transferee has... taken possession'.<sup>89</sup>

It is not necessary, that the contract must contain a direct covenant regarding transfer of possession. It is only necessary that possession should have been taken in part performance of the contract.<sup>90</sup>

It is not necessary that the transferee must be in possession of the entire property agreed to be sold. It is enough if the transferee continues in possession or takes possession even of a part of the property.<sup>91</sup> Where the transferee was already in possession of immovable property under an agreement of sale, and the transferor accepted delayed payment of instalment under the agreement by the transferee, and the transferee was willing to perform his part of contract, the benefit under s 53A cannot be denied to the transferee.<sup>92</sup>

Temporary possession was given to the defendant for carrying out construction. It was held that the exclusive possession in the legal sense remained with the plaintiff, and the defendants were not entitled to protect their possession under s 53A of the TP Act.<sup>93</sup>

(13) Possession, Change of Character

The Supreme Court has held that there is an understandable and noteworthy difference in the probative value of entering into possession for the time, and continuing in possession with claim of change in character. Where person claiming benefit of part performance of a contract was already in possession prior to the contract, the court would expect something independent of the mere retention of the possession to evidence part performance. It has been held that mere retention of possession, quite legal and valid, if mortgage with possession is not discharged, could hardly be said to be an act in part performance unequivocally referable to the contract of sale.<sup>94</sup> When a person already in possession of the property in some other capacity enters into a contract to purchase the property, to confer the benefit of protecting possession under the plea of part performance, his act effective from that day must be consistent with the contract alleged, and also such as cannot be referred to the preceding title.<sup>95</sup>

Where a person is already in possession as a tenant at the commencement of an unregistered lease, he would continue to be a tenant from month to month, and s 53A would not apply where the person remains in occupation of the premises sold to him after the termination of the period of lease.<sup>96</sup> A tenant who continued to be in possession as tenant, cannot take benefit of s 53A though subsequently an agreement to sale is entered between the parties.<sup>97</sup> In a Calcutta case,<sup>98</sup> on the expiry of the original lease, the lessee continued in possession under the renewal clause. Rent was paid for such period, but it was not shown to be independent of contract. It was held that the lessee was protected only under s 53A, and became a trespasser on the expiry of the renewed period. He did not become a monthly tenant. The court distinguished the decisions in Biswabani Pvt Ltd v Santhosh K Dutta<sup>99</sup> and Technical Studios v Lila Ghosh.<sup>1</sup>

The benefit of s 53A was not extended to the tenant, as the condition in the agreement to sell was that the possession as owner purchaser will be given to tenant at the time of the sale deed. Nothing was done on the part of the tenant in furtherance of the said agreement, and nothing was on the record to show that he ceased to be a tenant. It was held the tenant cannot take advantage of the doctrine of part performance, and the order of eviction against him meanwhile, is not illegal.<sup>2</sup>

(14) Adverse Possession

The Supreme Court in a case held that since the appellant case was founded on s 53A, it goes without saying that he admits by implication that he came into possession of the land lawfully under the agreement, and continued to remain in possession till date of suit; thereby, the plea of adverse possession is not available to appellant.<sup>3</sup> Plea of adverse possession and retaining the possession by operation of s 53A, are inconsistent with each other.<sup>4</sup>

(15) Act of Part Performance

Repairs and improvements effected under a mortgage cannot be an act of part performance under a subsequent sale, as it is an act preliminary to a sale.<sup>5</sup> The mere retention by a tenant,<sup>6</sup> or a mortgagee in possession,<sup>7</sup> of possession after the expiry of the original lease or mortgage is not an act of part performance. Similarly, possession obtained subsequent to the agreement, and not referable to it, is not an act of part performance.<sup>8</sup> Where, however, the tenant remains in possession after the expiry of an old lease, and pays reduced rent, it is an act of part performance of the renewal of the lease at a reduced rent.<sup>9</sup> So also, where the person puts up a house soon after being put in possession under an unregistered contract of sale.<sup>10</sup>

The section does not apply when a mortgagee in possession continues in possession under an oral sale;<sup>11</sup> the position would, of course, be different when the mortgagee retains possession under an unregistered deed of sale.<sup>12</sup>

So, also, where a lessee retained possession after the expiry of the lease, under a written agreement to purchase the property, for which he had paid the consideration.<sup>13</sup> For a tenant continuing in possession of an immovable property after a contract to transfer, written and signed by the landlord, to get the protection under s 53A, it is necessary to show that he continues in possession in pursuance of the contract. Mere continuance in possession does not satisfy the requirement of s 53A.<sup>14</sup>

The act in question must be referable to the contract alleged to have been partly performed.<sup>15</sup>

In the proceedings instituted by the landlord under the Rent Control Act for eviction, the tenant is entitled to set up the agreement of sale in his favour as a shield in defence to the action. After the date of such contract, and after it was performed in part by the payment of consideration towards the contract, if the landlord allows the tenant to remain in possession by reason of the new status created under the contract, the landlord cannot contend that the possession is still referable to the earlier contract. Under s 53A, it is not necessary that the deed of transfer must have been obtained before the section can be invoked.<sup>16</sup>

In two cases,<sup>17</sup> however, the doctrine was wrongly applied to oral sales to persons in possession, though there was no act done in furtherance of the contract for sale.

It has been held that the advancing of moneys for the purchase of stamp paper for the conveyance, was an act of part performance.<sup>18</sup>

(16) Has Performed or is Willing to Perform

The section confers no rights on a party who was not willing to perform his part of the contract.<sup>19</sup> A transferee has to prove that he was honestly ready, and willing to perform his part under the contract.<sup>20</sup> A prospective vendee who had taken possession could not resist dispossession, if he were not willing to pay the price agreed upon.<sup>21</sup> The High Court of Karnataka has pointed out that in order to substantiate the plea of part performance, the defendant who takes this plea must assert that he had demanded specific performance within the stipulated time. Plea of part-performance is not available in case one fails to plead in his written statement that he ready and willing to perform his part of contract.<sup>22</sup> Failure to take this plea would mean that he did not show readiness and willingness to perform his part of the contract.<sup>23</sup>

The doctrine of readiness and willingness is an emphatic way of expression to establish that the transferee always abides by the terms of the agreement, and is willing to perform his part of the contract. Part performance, as a statutory right, is conditioned upon the transferee's continuous willingness to perform his part of the contract in terms covenanted thereunder.<sup>24</sup>

Willingness to perform the roles ascribed to a party in a contract is primarily a mental disposition. However, such willingness in the context of s 53A of the TP Act must be absolute and unconditional.<sup>25</sup> If willingness is studded with a condition, it is in fact no more than an offer, and cannot be termed as willingness. Where the vendee company expresses its willingness to pay the amount, provided the plaintiff clears his income tax arrears, there is no complete willingness, but a conditional willingness or partial willingness which is not sufficient to arm the company with the shield provided under s 53A of the TP Act.<sup>26</sup>

In certain circumstances, once a party to a contract has repudiated a contract, it is not necessary for the other party to tender the amount payable under the contract in the manner provided in the contract, in order to successfully claim the specific performance of the contract. This does not, however, mean that where one party to a contract repudiates the contract, the other party to the contract, who claims specific performance of the contract, is absolved from his obligation to show that he was ready and willing to perform the contract.<sup>27</sup> In the instant case, the transferee was in possession of the premises and claimed protection under s 53A. Under the agreement of sale, he was required to pay regular instalments of a monthly sum to the transferor. After paying some instalments, he stopped payments, alleging that the transferor had repudiated the agreement. The arbitrator held that since the transferee stopped payment of the monthly sum, he could not be said to have performed or was willing to perform his part of the contract and, therefore, was not entitled to retain possession under the protection afforded by s 53A. It was held that the award of the arbitrator could not be set aside on the ground of error of law apparent on face of the award. It could not also be said that the arbitrator was guilty of misconduct.

So also, a person who falsely pleads that he has paid the full consideration for the transfer, and is found not to have paid a part of the consideration is not entitled to the benefit of the section.<sup>28</sup> It is, however, not necessary that the willingness to perform the terms must be expressly pleaded in the pleadings.<sup>29</sup>

In judging willingness to perform, the court must consider the obligations of the parties, and the sequence in which they were to be performed. So a buyer could not be said to be not willing if he was to pay the balance of the purchase money after the revenue records were rectified, and did not do so because they were not rectified.<sup>30</sup>

This is also the position in English Law, based on the maxim, 'he who seeks equity must do equity.' So, where a person in possession under an agreement to lease, has failed to perform a condition precedent to the agreement, he was not allowed to raise the equity of Walsh v Lonsdale.<sup>31</sup> With reference to s 53A, the High Court of Punjab and Haryana has held that the tenants who claim to have agreed to purchase the property must take the plea that he has performed, or is willing to perform, his part of the contract.<sup>32</sup>

(17) then

Section 53A makes it clear by employing the word 'then' after laying down the pre-requisites that a transferee can seek refuge under it only after satisfying the other pre-requisites.<sup>33</sup>

(18) Though the Contract is Not Registered

These words expressly supersede the provisions of the Registration Act 1908. Under the proviso added to s 49 of the Registration Act 1908, unregistered documents are admissible as evidence of part performance. However, by the amendments made by the Registration and Other Related Laws (Amendment) Act 2001, which has come into force with effect from 24 September 2001, as already noticed above, the words 'the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or,' as appearing in para 4 of s 53A has been omitted. Simultaneously, ss 17 and 49 of the Registration Act 1908 has been amended making it clear that unless the documents containing contract to transfer for consideration any immovable property for the purpose of s 53A is registered, it shall not have effect for the purposes of s 53A.

(19) Where there is an Instrument of Transfer

The case of an instrument of transfer is put in the alternative. The amendment to s 49 of the Registration Act 1908 shows that the section applies although there is not a distinct and separate contract in writing. The instrument itself is treated as the contract in writing, as was done by CJ Jenkins in Puchha Lal v Kunj Behari Lal.<sup>34</sup>

In order that the doctrine of part performance may be invoked, it is necessary that the acts of part performance must be such as not only to be referable to the contract of which the part performance is alleged, but to be referable to no other title.<sup>35</sup>

After the amending Act of 2001, unless the documents containing contract to transfer for consideration any immovable property for the purpose of s 53A is registered, it shall not have effect for the purposes of s 53A. The section does not apply to an unregistered instrument. However, even prior to the above amendment, it was held that the section would not apply if the instrument is unsigned, or if it cannot be proved for some other reason, eg, if the original is unstamped and lost so that secondary evidence, is inadmissible, as in Hiralal v Shankar.<sup>36</sup> The doctrine does not extend to gifts.<sup>37</sup>

(20) Nature of Right:Available Only as a Defence

The Privy Council in Probodh Kumar Das v Dantmara Tea Co<sup>38</sup> has held that the right conferred by s 53A is a right available only to the defendant to protect his possession. The section is so framed as to impose statutory bar on the transfer; it confers no active title on the transferee. Indeed any other reading of it would make serious inroad on the whole scheme of the TP Act. The above law laid down has been followed with approval by Supreme Court in Technicians Studio Pvt Ltd v Leela Ghosh.<sup>39</sup>

It has been held that part-performance in India does not give rise to equity as in England, but to a statutory right which is a comparatively restricted right. In that, it is available only as a defence. It has been held that s 53A is only a partial importation in the statute law of India of the English doctrine of part-performance. Thus, a person who is led into possession on the strength of a void lease does not acquire any interest in the property, but gets under s 53A only a right to defend his possession. It can be used only as a defence.<sup>40</sup> Following Probodh Kumar, the Supreme Court again in Delhi Motor Company v UA Basrurkar<sup>41</sup> has held that s 53A is only available as defence to the lessee, and not as confirming a right as the basis of which the lessee can claim rights against the lessor.

This section does not create a title in the defendant. It merely operates as a bar to the plaintiff asserting his title. It is limited to cases where the transferee had taken possession, and against whom the transferor is debarred from enforcing any right, other than that expressly provided by the contract. The section imposes a bar on the transferor. When the conditions mentioned in the section are fulfilled, it debars him from enforcing against the transferee any right or interest not expressly provided by the contract. So far as the transferee is concerned, the section confers a right on him to the extent it imposes a bar on the transferor. However, that is only a right to protect his possession against any challenge to it by the latter contrary to the terms of the contract.<sup>42</sup> The section imposes a statutory bar on the transferor, but confers no title on the transferee.<sup>43</sup>

The section does not confer title on the defendant in possession;<sup>44</sup> and he cannot maintain a suit on title<sup>45</sup> The Supreme Court has approved this principle.<sup>46</sup>

In a Supreme Court case, the appellant company was the sub-lessee of the disputed premises. A suit for eviction was decreed against it, but ultimately, in revision before the high court, there was a compromise under which the appellant company became a direct tenant (instead of being a sub-lessee) for 16 years, the rent being paid on a monthly basis. No deed was executed, nor was the compromise registered. On the expiry of the period of lease, the landlord issued a notice to quit, and a suit for eviction was filed. It was held that the compromise required registration and this having not been done, it created no interest in favour of the appellant, though he could protect his eviction for 16 years, by reason of part performance. On the expiry of the said period, he had no protection at all. The subsequent possession after the passing of the compromise decree conferred no active title on the transferee, but only imposed a statutory bar on the transferor.<sup>47</sup> The plaintiff brought a suit for specific performance on the footing that the unregistered document in the suit was an agreement to sell land. The plaintiff's main plea was founded on part performance. However, in the documents itself, it was stated that full consideration for the land was also delivered to the plaintiff-vendee. Thus, the passing of consideration and passing of title--the two essential incidents to constitute a sale deed--being present in the document, there could be no escape from the conclusion that the document was nothing but a sale deed. However, the document being unregistered, the sale must fail. In such case, if it is found that the plaintiff had been given possession of the suit land simultaneously with the execution of the sale deed, and was continuously in possession, the plaintiff cannot be non-suited and would be entitled to a decree for permanent injunction to protect his title.<sup>48</sup>

It is only in the case of a suit for specific performance that part performance assists a plaintiff. A transferee who has come into possession of the property in part performance of a written agreement can continue in possession, if he is ready and willing to perform his part of the agreement. In such a case, it is not necessary that the transferee should have filed a suit for specific performance within the period of limitation prescribed for a suit for specific performance.<sup>49</sup> According to the Bombay High Court, an application for temporary injunction in a suit seeking specific performance of agreement of sale of land cannot be treated as an application for the relief of injunction under s 53A. The high court dissented from a Madras case holding to the contrary.<sup>50</sup>

A transferee in possession under s 53A of the TP Act can ask for an injunction for the protection of his rights. He can claim injunction against the transferor restraining him from interfering with his possession.<sup>51</sup> The Madhya Pradesh High Court has held that a transferee-in-possession satisfying all conditions of the section must be protected by the court, whether he comes as a plaintiff or as a defendant. The court cannot tell the transferee-in-possession if he comes as a plaintiff -- 'go back, use your physical strength and muscle power to resist and repel the attack of the transferor and drive him to come to the court as a plaintiff and then if you are arrayed as a defendant, the court will protect you.'<sup>52</sup>

(21) Part Performance Not a Sword

Some Indian decisions betray a misconception of the limited scope of the section. In a Bombay case,<sup>53</sup> a defendant who had taken possession under an unregistered lease, was held liable for the rent, and damages were awarded to the plaintiff. In this case, the section was used as a ground of attack, and the cardinal principle was overlooked, ie, part performance must be the act of the person seeking to avail himself of the equity, and that acts of the person sought to be charged are of no avail. In a Rangoon case,<sup>54</sup> the court granted a declaration of right to the person claiming under the transferee. A Lahore case,<sup>55</sup> where the transferee who was in possession was said to have a right under the section, can perhaps be explained as meaning that he had a right to resist dispossession.

In this regard, the Supreme Court has laid to rest all doubts, and held that the benefit of s 53A cannot be taken aid of by the transferee-plaintiff to establish his right as owner of the property.<sup>56</sup> It has further been held that s 53A can be used as a shield, but not as an independent claim either as plaintiff, or as a defendant.<sup>57</sup> It is a 'weapon of defence and not attack'.<sup>58</sup> In a matter with regard to an unregistered lease deed, the Supreme Court held that s 53A is meant only to bring out a bar against the enforcement of a right by a lessor in respect of the property of which the lessee had already taken possession, but does not give any right to the lessee to claim possession, or to claim any other rights on the basis of an unregistered lease.<sup>59</sup> Right under this section cannot be pressed into service against a third party like state purporting to enforce the provisions of Uttar Pradesh Imposition of Ceiling on Land Holdings Act 1960 against the proposed transferor of lands.<sup>60</sup>

No doubt s 53A creates a right in favour of transferee to defend his possession. But if he is forcibly ejected by the transferor, he can file a suit for recovery of possession not pursuant to s 53A, but under s 6 of the Specific Relief Act 1963.<sup>61</sup> However, the Madhya Pradesh High Court has held that a transferee-in-possession satisfying all conditions of the section must be protected by the court, whether he comes as a plaintiff or as a defendant.

The court cannot tell the transferee-in-possession if he comes as a plaintiff--'go back, use your physical strength and muscle power to resist and repel the attack of the transferor and drive him to come to the court as a plaintiff and then if you are arrayed as a defendant, the court will protect you.'<sup>62</sup> A Full Bench of Bombay High Court has held that when it is said that proposed transferee-in-possession can use s 53A as a shield, but not as a sword, it means that he can use s 53A either as a plaintiff or as a defendant to protect his possession, but he cannot use s 53A either for getting title or for getting possession if he is not actually in possession. In other words, when the transferee-in-possession comes to the court as a plaintiff seeking a decree of perpetual injunction against the transferor, he is using s 53A as a shield to protect his possession.<sup>63</sup>

With reference to s 53A, the High Court of Punjab and Haryana has held that the section applies only when the defendant transferee seeks to debar the transferor from enforcing his right of transfer of property. In other words, s 53A can be used only as a defence. The high court dissented from the views taken to the contrary in Ram Chander v Maharaj Kanwar<sup>64</sup>; Achayya v Venkata Subba Rao<sup>65</sup> and Amrao Singh v Sanathan Dharma Sabha<sup>66</sup>. The high court agreed with the view taken to the same effect in Padmanabh v Appalanarasamma<sup>67</sup> and Motilal v Jaswant Singh.<sup>68</sup>

The right conferred by s 53A is a right available only to the defendant to protect his position; it does not create any title in the defendant. It operates merely as a bar to the plaintiff asserting his title, and cannot be used as a weapon of attack. A person who has agreed to purchase can, on the basis of the agreement to sell, institute only a suit for specific performance of the contract. He cannot maintain a claim or objection under o 21, r 58 of Code of Civil Procedure 1908 on the basis of the agreement to sell.

It was clearly stipulated in an agreement to sell in favour of the objection in respect of the attached property, that possession would be delivered to the objector after the execution of the sale deed. It was not in dispute that the judgment-debtor was in actual possession of the property at the time of execution of the agreement, and continued to be in possession thereafter. It was held that in view of the provisions of ss 53A and 55 of the TP Act and o 21, r 59 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, the objector could not maintain an objection petition on the basis of the rent note allegedly executed on the same date on which the agreement to sell was executed.<sup>69</sup>

According to the Allahabad High Court, s 53A applies to the transferee, even if he is a plaintiff. Further, it applies not only where the transferee is physically in possession on the date of suit, but also where he has been illegally dispossessed by some person claiming under the transferor. A contrary interpretation would reduce the utility of the section to a naught, because a powerful transferor would then, defeat the section by forcibly dispossessing the transferee and compelling him to sue as a plaintiff.<sup>70</sup> It is, of course, not available under the section.<sup>71</sup>

(22) Payment Remaining Due

A person cannot be debarred from taking advantage of s 53A, merely because he has not paid the amount in full, particularly when, by filing a suit for specific performance, he has evinced his readiness and willingness to perform the contract.<sup>72</sup> A society was in possession of land leased out to it by a municipality. The society apprehended eviction by the municipality, and filed a suit seeking protection to its possession under s 53A. It was held that the society must be protected from unjust invasion by the municipality over its legitimate rights. It was seeking protection as a shield, and not as a sword.<sup>73</sup>

(23) Who is Entitled to the Benefit of Part Performance

The words of the section do not warrant a conclusion that the plaintiff as such is necessarily debarred from the benefit of the section.<sup>74</sup> The true position, as explained by CJ Subba Rao as he then was, in a case decided by High Court of Andhra Pradesh is:

Whether the transferee occupies the position of a plaintiff or a defendant, he can resist the transferor's claim against the property. Conversely, whether the transferor is the plaintiff or the defendant, he cannot enforce his rights in respect of the property against the transferee. The utility of the section or the rights conferred thereunder should not be made to depend on the manoeuvring for positions in a court of law, otherwise a powerful transferor can always defeat the salutary provisions of the section by dispossessing the transferee by force and compelling him to go to a court as plaintiff. Doubtless, the right conveyed under the section can be relied upon only as a shield and not as a sword but the protection is available to the transferee both as a plaintiff and as a defendant so long as he uses it as a shield.<sup>75</sup>

Whether the above statement was a correct statement of the law, was kept open by the Supreme Court.<sup>76</sup>

So, since the object of a suit under O 21, r 103 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908 is to protect possession, and the capacity in which the plaintiff comes to the court is, in reality, of defence, the plaintiff can take advantage of s 53A.<sup>77</sup>

Section 53A cannot be enforced against non-alienating coparceners who are not parties to an agreement of sale.<sup>78</sup> Section 53A operates only against a transferor, but not against a co-sharer who was not a party to the transfer, nor does it have any effect of superseding s 44 of the TP Act, and frustrate the right of the co-sharer in a family dwelling house as contemplated in s 44.<sup>79</sup>

(24) Transferor, or Person Claiming under him

The person claiming under a transferor, referred to in the section, is a person who claims under a title derived subsequently to the transfer, and not anterior to it.<sup>80</sup> The test for determining whether these words in s 53A apply to a Hindu reversioner is, whether the acts of the deceased widow affecting the property bind the reversioner. If her acts bind the property, they must bind the reversioner in the same manner, and to the same extent as the acts of an absolute owner would bind his heir. The reversioner may not be her heir, but is certainly her successor, and is bound by her acts which lawfully affect the property, and to the extent he is so bound, he becomes a person claiming under her.<sup>81</sup>

A reversioner comes within the expression 'person claiming under him' in the context of Hindu law. Though reversioners do not claim through the widow, they are the successors-in-title of the estate after the widow's death, in the sense that the extent of the estate which would devolve on him would depend on the exercise by the widow of her right of disposal for legal necessity.<sup>82</sup>

Where an agreement is entered into by a guardian, which he was competent to enter into so as to bind the minor, and is for the minor's benefit, the minor is the transferor within the meaning of the section, and is debarred from obtaining possession from the transferee.<sup>83</sup> A judgment creditor who has attached the property of a judgment debtor in possession of an intended purchaser is a person claiming under the transferor.<sup>84</sup> A person who holds in adverse possession to the transferor is, of course, not a person claiming under him.<sup>85</sup> Similarly, where a Hindu father executed a document of transfer of joint family property, the sons who were entitled to two-thirds of the property were not affected, by this section, as they do not claim under the father.<sup>86</sup>

The successor in interest of a lessor is not a person 'claiming' under the lessee within the meaning of s 53A.<sup>87</sup>

(25) Right Expressly Provided by the Contract

The transferor may, of course, enforce a right which is expressly provided by the terms of the contract. So, if the contract were an agreement of lease not provable for want of registration, the lessee could not resist a demand for rent. If he did so, he would be disentitled to the benefit of the section as not being willing to perform his part of the contract. So also where a lessee is already put in possession of certain premises in part performance of an unregistered lease, the lessor can enforce the term of the lease entitling him to re-enter, if there is default in payment of six months' rent.<sup>88</sup>

Similarly, if the unregistered lease was only for a term, there would be no right to continue in possession after the expiry of the term.<sup>89</sup>

(26) Proviso: Transferee for Consideration without Notice

The purpose of proviso is to defeat a claim which would otherwise, have succeeded under the main part of the section. The question of this proviso does not arise until and unless the claimant has substantiated his claim under the main part of the section. If the defendant fails to establish the requirements of s 53A, the proviso would not come into the picture at all, irrespective of whether transferee has notice of the defendant's agreement or the part performance thereof, he will be entitled to succeed.<sup>90</sup>

The proviso to the section saves the right of a transferee for consideration who has no notice of the contract or its part performance.<sup>91</sup> The burden of proving that he is a transferee for consideration without notice is on the transferee.<sup>92</sup> This was so held prior to the enactment of s 53A. As to what constitutes notice, has been discussed in s 3 above. It has been held that possession by the earlier transferee would operate as notice; the court relied on illustration 2 to s 27(b) of the Specific Relief Act 1877.<sup>93</sup> The Specific Relief Act of 1963, re-enacts the section as s 19(b), but contains no illustrations.

In a Rajasthan case, it was held that though the burden of proving that the subsequent transferee had notice of the prior contract lay on the defendant (who claimed the benefit of part performance), the subsequent transferee must be taken to have implied notice of the agreement (to sell) and of part performance, because since the defendant was admittedly in possession, the transferee would have had notice of the title of the defendant, but for wilful abstention from inquiry. In this case, the defendant was in possession as mortgagee and agreed to purchase.<sup>94</sup>

(27) Agreement Otherwise Invalid

The section specifically allows the doctrine of part-performance to be applied to agreements which though required to be registered, are not registered, and to transfers not completed in the manner prescribed by any law. The section is, therefore, applicable to cases where a transfer has not been completed in the manner required by law, unless such non-compliance with the procedural or formal requirements results in the transfer being void.

If the agreement is void under any other law, neither the section, nor the doctrine of equity on which it is founded will validate that which the law says is invalid. This proposition follows from the decisions of the Privy Council in Ariff v Jadunath<sup>95</sup> and Mian Pir Bux v Sardar Mahomed Tahar.<sup>96</sup>

The following agreements have, therefore, been held outside the scope of the doctrine: an agreement by a client to transfer land to a mukhtiar as remuneration for his services, which was invalid under s 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act 1879;<sup>97</sup> an agreement regarding the transfer of immovable property belonging to a company in liquidation executed by the liquidator which was not duly sanctioned by the creditors under s 212 of the Indian Companies Act 1913;<sup>98</sup> an agreement subsequent to the TP Act by a reversioner to transfer his right of succession;<sup>99</sup> an agreement on behalf of a trust to which all the trustees have not joined.<sup>1</sup>

The doctrine of part performance cannot be availed of in respect of a transaction which is null and void. Where possession by the transferor to the transferee was not supported by any valid transfer or by title holder, the transferee cannot claim possession of the suit property as part performance.<sup>2</sup> A transfer in contravention to s 165-A of Madhya Pradesh land revenue Code being void, s 53A cannot be invoked in such a case. The purchaser may claim refund of consideration under s 65 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.<sup>3</sup>

In an Andhra Pradesh case, it was held on the facts that the possession given to the petitioners in pursuance of the contract of sale without obtaining previous sanction of the tehsildar as required under s 471, Hyderabad Tenancy Act (the sale being by a tribal in favour of a non-tribal) was unlawful, and s 53A could not give any protection for such possession.<sup>4</sup>

In a case where possession was obtained under an agreement of sale in respect of service inam land violating s 5 of the Madras Hereditary Village Offices Act, it was held that the provisions of s 53A of the TP Act cannot be resorted to by the would-be vendee to maintain his possession.<sup>5</sup> Where there was a sale of land by a member of the schedule tribe in contravention of the provisions under s 3(1)(a) of the Andhra Pradesh Scheduled Areas Land Transfer Regulation 1959, it was held that a person in possession of immovable property in contravention of s 3(1)(a) of the said Act would not be entitled to claim the benefit of s 53A of the TP Act.<sup>6</sup> Similarly, where sale deeds were not valid for want of necessary permission under s 22 of the Orissa Land Reforms Act 1960, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to ask for protection of his possession under s 53A of the TP Act, his possession being on the basis of a void transaction.<sup>7</sup>

(28) Agreements Conditional on Compliance with Statute

There is, however, a distinction between an agreement void as such, and an agreement void in the absence of something which the vendor could do, and had expressly or impliedly contracted to do. Where a vendor agrees to sell his share of property including sir land, there is an implied term in the contract that he will apply for sanction to the revenue authorities necessary for such transfers, and the court will direct him to do so.<sup>8</sup>

It cannot be said that such an agreement is void because no sanction has been obtained.<sup>9</sup>

It has been held that the equity is not available in the case of agreements by a municipal body without complying with the requisite formalities prescribed by the statute incorporating such body.<sup>10</sup> This appears to be correct as an agreement made without complying with such formalities is not a contract at all. In some cases, however, such an 'agreement' can give rise to a promissory estoppel, or an equity similar to that in Ramsden v Dyson.<sup>11</sup> A defence under s 53A involves a question of fact, and its foundation ought to be laid in the pleadings as well as in the evidence. The defence cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.<sup>12</sup>

In a Calcutta case, it was held that if all the ingredient facts required to support the defence in part performance are stated in the written statement, the defendant will be entitled to raise such a defence even though the defence is not mentioned in the written statement.<sup>13</sup>

(29) Plea of Part Performance

The plea under s 53A, being a mixed question of law and fact, cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal by the respondent.<sup>14</sup> In absence of a contract in writing, a party cannot be allowed to raise a plea of part performance.<sup>15</sup>

(30) Equity in *Walsh v Lonsdale

The equity in Walsh v Lonsdale<sup>16</sup> may be stated thus: Where (in a case where a lease not under seal is void at law) A agrees to let land to B on lease, and B goes into possession, and the agreement is one of which specific performance would be granted, A and B have the same legal rights as between themselves and are subject to the same legal liabilities, as if a lease under the seal had been granted on terms of the agreement. Hence, the landlord has the same power of distress as he would have had if a lease under seal had been granted, and the tenant can only be evicted if he has committed such a breach of covenant as would (if a lease had been granted) have entitled the landlord to re-enter. The equity depends not so much on part performance as on the fact that there is a valid contract between the parties still capable of specific performance, and is an instance of the rule that equity regards as done what ought to have been done.

As has been noted, the Privy Council have held that no equitable rule could override the express provisions of TP Act or the Registration Act 1908 regarding writing or registration.<sup>17</sup> The enactment of this section has only altered that position by creating the limited right conferred under the section, and it is settled law that no other equitable right can supersede the provisions referring to writing or registration.<sup>18</sup> It follows, therefore, that there is no scope in India for applying the equity of Walsh v Lonsdale, except in the limited class of cases where an interest in land can be created without registration, eg a lease for less than one year, or a sale for less than Rs 100. In such a case, if the defendant were in possession, he would not require protection for he would be the owner of the interest; and if he were not, his remedy would be a suit for possession.

The decisions of the Privy Council, referred to above, had the effect of overruling a number of decisions where the equity in Walsh v Lonsdale had been applied. In those decisions, the equity had been applied to agreement of lease,<sup>19</sup> exchange,<sup>20</sup> mortgage,<sup>21</sup> sale,<sup>22</sup> or release,<sup>23</sup> where the agreements were not registered. In several of these cases it was recognised that the equity was not available after a suit for specific performance has become time-barred,<sup>24</sup> or has been dismissed,<sup>25</sup> or after the execution of a decree for specific performance has become time-barred.<sup>26</sup>

It had also been held that though the equity confers no title,<sup>27</sup> it conferred an interest which is attachable and saleable.<sup>28</sup>

Fiduciary capacity of vendor

In a Bombay case,<sup>29</sup> CJ Scott said that if a vendor who has contracted to sell immovable property puts the prospective vendee in possession, and then seeks to eject the vendee who is willing to complete the purchase, he is repudiating his fiduciary obligation, and the court will not grant him the relief he seeks. This is not a correct statement of the law as explained in Mian Pir Bux v Sardar Mahomed Tahar,<sup>30</sup> for it treats a contract of sale as a declaration of trust, even though under s 5 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882, such a declaration must be registered. The same equity was, however, applied by CJ Macleod in Venkatesh v Malappa,<sup>31</sup> and in a number of decisions of the Rangoon High Court.<sup>32</sup> The true position was explained by CJ Page in Official Assignee v ME Moola & Sons Ltd,<sup>33</sup> which was affirmed by the Privy Council,<sup>34</sup> and several decisions of Rangoon High Court were expressly overruled by a Full Bench of that high court in Ma Kyi v Ma Thon.<sup>35</sup> This position has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in Chaliagulla Ramaschandrayya v Boppna Satyanarayana,<sup>36</sup> where the court held that the only equity which prevailed against the statutory provisions regarding writing, registration, etc was the right enacted in s 53A.

In some cases, however, the prospective transferee can invoke the equity of Ramsden v Dyson, or the doctrine of promissory estoppel even in cases where he cannot invoke s 53A.

The plea of part performance cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal,<sup>37</sup> but the plea can be taken even if no specific pleading is made of all the ingredients.<sup>38</sup>

17 The words 'the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or' have been omitted by s 10 of the Registration and Other Related Laws Amendment Act 2001 (Act no 48 of 2001) wef 24 September 2001.

Sale Defined

--"Sale" is a transfer of ownership in exchange for a price paid or promised or part-paid and part-promised.

Sale how made.

--Such transfer, in the case of tangible immovable property of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, or in the case of a reversion or other intangible thing, can be made only by a registered instrument.

In the case of tangible immovable property of a value less than one hundred rupees, such transfer may be made either by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property.

Delivery of tangible immovable property takes place when the seller places the buyer, or such person as he directs, in possession of the property.

Contract for sale.

--A contract for the sale of immovable property is a contract that a sale of such property shall take place on terms settled between the parties.

It does not, of itself, create any interest in or charge on such property.

Sale

The section deals with three subjects:

- I. Definition of sale.
- II. Mode of transfer by sale.
- III. Contract for sale.

I-Definition of Sale

(1) Definition

The definition indicates that in order to constitute a sale, there must be transfer of ownership from one person to another, ie, all rights and interests in the properties which are possessed by that person are transferred by him to another person. The transferor cannot retain any part of his interest or right in that property, or else it would not be a sale. The definition further says that the transfer of ownership has to be for a 'price paid or promised or part-paid and part-promised'. Price thus constitutes an essential ingredient of the transaction of sale. The words 'price paid or promised or part-paid and part-promise' indicate that actual payment of the whole of the price at the time of the execution of sale deed is not a sine qua non to the completion of the sale. Even if the whole price is not paid but the document is executed and thereafter registered, if the property is of the value of more than Rs 100, the sale would be complete.<sup>1</sup> In a lease, there is a partial transfer or demise and the rights left in the transferor are called the reversion.<sup>2</sup> In a mortgage, there is a transfer of an interest to the extent stated in s 58 below. A sale is, however, distinguishable from a hire-purchase agreement. If the transferee has eventually to pay the entire purchase price, it may be a circumstance indicating that the transaction was meant to be a sale. On the other hand, if the transferee is given a right to terminate the agreement, that may be a circumstance indicating that the transaction is a hire-purchase agreement.<sup>3</sup>

An agreement for sale and purchase simpliciter is a reciprocal arrangement imposing obligations and benefits on both parties, and is enforceable at the instance of either. However, when an agreement provides that the right to obtain a sale is subject to the fulfilment of certain conditions by the purchaser, the agreement would in effect be an option to purchase, as the right to purchase would only accrue upon the voluntary performance of the conditions specified by the owner. The vendor cannot compel the performance of the conditions by the purchaser, and then ask for the contract to be specifically performed.<sup>4</sup>

The essential elements of a sale are:

- (1) the parties;

- (2) the subject-matter;
- (3) the transfer or conveyance (discussed under s 55);
- (4) the price or consideration.

(2) Parties to Sale

The parties are the seller and the buyer.

The seller must be a person competent to transfer. This is a matter dealt with in the notes to s 7. He must be competent to contract, and he must have title to the property or authority to transfer it, if it is not his own.

The buyer may be any person who is not disqualified to be a transferee under s 6(h)(3). A duly executed transfer by way of sale to a minor who had paid the consideration is valid.<sup>5</sup> A sale deed executed when vendor was a minor is not per se void, but becomes voidable as soon as the option is exercised by the minor through the guardian.<sup>6</sup> Vendor sold the properties to the vendee, who undertook to discharge the debts due to the mortgagee of the vendor. Vendor alleged that properties were to be conveyed to him after discharge of the mortgage debts, and that the transaction was a sham one. It was held that the mere fact that vendee did not discharge the debt did not make the transaction a sham one. This was more so, because-

- (i) possession had already been delivered to the vendee;
- (ii) there was mutation of names in the municipal records;
- (iii) stamp for the sale deed stood only in vendee's name; and
- (iv) some amount in cash was also paid by the vendee as part of consideration making sale deed to be real as fully supported by consideration.<sup>7</sup>

With regard to persons under disability like pardanashin or illiterate lady, the court must be satisfied that the deed had been explained to and understood by the party, under disability, either before execution or after it under circumstances showing that the deed has been executed with full knowledge and comprehension. Mere execution by such a person, although unaccompanied by duress, protest or obvious signs of misunderstanding or want of comprehensions, is, in itself, no real proof of a true understanding in the mind of the executant.<sup>8</sup> It has to be proved that such execution is the mental act of the maker.<sup>9</sup>

(3) Subject-matter of Sale

The subject-matter is transferable immovable property. The section is not applicable to the sale of movable property which is governed by the Indian Sale of Goods Act 1929.<sup>10</sup> Immovable property has been explained in the note under that heading under s 3. Immovable property is transferable except in the cases specified in s 6.

The definition of immovable property in the General Clauses Act includes land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth. Things attached to the earth are mentioned in s 8 as incidents which pass with the land on transfer, and are defined in s 3. Land and things attached to the earth are things which can be touched and are, therefore, tangible immovable property. Thus, a field or a house is tangible immovable property. A benefit to arise out of land is immovable property, and is an interest in land. However, such interests may or may not be tangible. An undivided share in land is tangible as the owner has joint physical possession.<sup>11</sup> However, an easement, a right of ferry, or a fishery are intangible, for these are rights exercised over the property of another, and cannot be perceived by the sense of touch. There has been a conflict of decisions as to whether an equity of redemption is tangible, or an intangible immovable property. It was held in a number of cases that the equity of redemption in a simple mortgage is tangible for the owner is in possession, but is intangible in a usufructuary mortgage because he is not in physical possession.<sup>12</sup> Conversely, as to the mortgagee's interest, that it was intangible in a simple mortgage, but tangible if the mortgagee is a usufructuary mortgagee.<sup>13</sup> That has also the opinion of CJ Sulaiman in his minority opinion in Sohan Lal v Mohan Lal,<sup>14</sup> and was described as well-founded in principle in earlier editions of this work. The judgment of the majority of the judges in Sohan Lal v Mohan Lal was, however, that an equity of redemption is tangible property even in the case of a usufructuary mortgage and was based, inter alia on the following passage from Salmon's Jurisprudence.<sup>15</sup>

The right of the owner of a thing may be all but eaten up by the dominant rights of lessees, mortgagees and other encumbrances. His ownership may be reduced to a mere name rather than a reality. Yet he nonetheless remains the owner of the thing, for all the others own nothing more than rights over it.

The majority view has been followed by the Patna,<sup>16</sup> Bombay,<sup>17</sup> Andhra Pradesh,<sup>18</sup> and Rajasthan<sup>19</sup> High Courts.

An interest under a deed of settlement, whereby a person is granted an income in future rents and profits of certain immovable property, and also a share in the proceeds of the property in future, is 'immovable property' within the meaning of the section.<sup>20</sup> In an agreement of sale of land, it is not necessary to mention that the well, room, tubewell and trees are standing on the land.<sup>21</sup>

(4) Tangible and Intangible Property

The distinction between tangible and intangible immovable property is analogous to that made in English law between a corporeal hereditament and an incorporeal hereditament. Topham explains the distinction as follows:

A corporeal hereditament is an interest in land in possession, ie a present right to enjoy the possession of land. An incorporeal hereditament is a right over land in the possession of another, which may be a future right to possession, or a right to use for a special purpose land in the possession of another, eg a right of way.<sup>22</sup>

The contrast is between the estate of one who is possessed of the land, the tangible thing, and that of a man who has the mere right, the intangible thing, without possession of anything tangible.<sup>23</sup>

The 'other intangible thing' in s 54 is intended to embrace those imponderables related to immovable property. A patta right is intangible property, and the sale of such a right must be effected by a registered instrument.<sup>24</sup> It cannot include such things as a mere licence to sell electricity.<sup>25</sup>

A licence to enter into land, and fish is a transaction relating to profits a pendre, and must be registered under this section.<sup>26</sup>

The right to catch and carry away fish is a benefit arising out of land, and is 'immovable property' within the meaning of the TP Act read in the light of s 3(26) of the General Clauses Act. If it is regarded as tangible immovable property, the sale must be (under s 54) by a registered instrument, if the value exceeds Rs 100. If it is regarded as intangible immovable property, the sale must be by a registered instrument, irrespective of its value. Therefore, in either of the two situations, the grant of a profit a pendre must be by a registered instrument (if the value exceeds Rs 100). Hence, the sale of such a right, if not effected by registered instrument, passes no title.<sup>27</sup> Growing crops are, of course, excluded from the definition of immovable property by s 3; but a contract to take tendu leaves, adjat timber etc from land was not limited to growing crops, and must be registered.<sup>28</sup>

(5) Mortgage Debt

The mortgage debts can no longer be transferred as actionable claims under chapter VIII of TP Act. They can only be transferred by way of sale under s 54, or by way of exchange under s 118, or by way of gift under s 123, but in all cases as immovable property, and consequently only by registered instrument.<sup>29</sup> However, the Privy Council have held that an unregistered transfer of a mortgage debt may be treated as a transfer of the debt dissociated from the security.<sup>30</sup>

(6) Reversion

A reversion is particularly mentioned, probably because the lessor, although out of possession, is able to give symbolical possession by his lessee attorney to the transferee. However, such symbolical possession is not equivalent to physical possession and a reversion is, therefore, intangible.<sup>31</sup> A transfer of a reversion is a transfer of a right to future rents which is a'benefit to arise out of land' within the meaning of the phrase used in the definition of immovable property in the Registration Act 1908.<sup>32</sup> Arrears of rent already accrued due are not a benefit to arise out of land, but a mere debt or chose in action, and not immovable property at all.<sup>33</sup>

(7) Fruits of an Action

An assignment of the fruits of an action is not illegal,<sup>34</sup> but such an assignment is not a sale although the suit (action) is for the possession of immovable property,<sup>35</sup> because, if the defendant succeeded and the suit were dismissed, there would be no property to be sold.<sup>36</sup> On the other hand, if the seller has a present title, the mere fact that he is out of possession will not justify the inference that the sale is a transfer of a law suit.<sup>37</sup>

(8) Easements

The grant of an easement is not a transfer of ownership under this section;<sup>38</sup> and the provisions of the TP Act have no application to the creation of an easement.<sup>39</sup>

(9) Exchange and Sale

Though, under s 118 (exchange), the formalities required for sale are made applicable to an exchange, that does not mean that all the requirements of s 54 must apply to an exchange.<sup>40</sup> Thus, a grant of land on what is called adhlapi tenure, ie, a transfer of land in return for work done in clearing land and sinking a well, is not a sale;<sup>41</sup> and a transfer of life interest in land in discharge of a claim for maintenance is neither a sale, nor an exchange, nor a gift.<sup>42</sup> A transfer of land in satisfaction of a charge for maintenance has been held to be not a sale, but an exchange.<sup>43</sup> A transfer of land in satisfaction of a wife's claim for dower is not a sale.<sup>44</sup> So also, a sale deed executed by a husband in consideration of a wife's claim for khurach pandan (which was a personal right) valued at Rs 14,000, is not a sale for the price.<sup>45</sup> So also a transaction by which a person agreed to file a suit to redeem a mortgage and to bear all expenses and charges in respect of such a suit, is not a sale.<sup>46</sup> However, where parties were to exchange properties with one of them paying an additional sum of rupees one lakh as equalisation of value, it was held that it amounts to sale, and not exchange.<sup>47</sup>

However, in some cases such a transaction has been held to be a sale on the ground (submitted to be erroneous) that the extinction of the dower debt is equivalent to the payment of price.<sup>48</sup> If the consideration for the transfer is not money only, but also forbearance to sue or to take proceedings, the transfer is not a sale.<sup>49</sup> A transaction in consideration of the regard for the transferee, who also agreed to maintain the transferor, is not a sale.<sup>50</sup> A compromise affecting immovable property is an acknowledgment of an existing right, and does not operate as a sale,<sup>51</sup> but there would be cases in which a compromise might result in a sale.<sup>52</sup> A decretal amount may be the price,<sup>53</sup> an advance made by one brother to another is a good consideration for a sale.<sup>54</sup>

(10) Hire Purchase

Hire purchase transaction is not sale. Stipulation authorising the owner to seize a vehicle given out on hire purchase for non-payment of an installment, is valid.<sup>55</sup>

(11) Price-Meaning of

The word'price' is used in its ordinary sense as meaning money only.<sup>56</sup> It is used in the same sense as in s 77 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 as enacted.<sup>57</sup> The Supreme Court has held that though'price' is not defined in the TP Act, it is used in the same sense as in the Sale of Goods Act 1930, and means the money consideration for the sale of goods.<sup>58</sup> The presence of a money consideration is an essential element in a transaction of sale; if the consideration is not money, but some other valuable consideration, it may be an exchange or barter, but not a sale.<sup>59</sup> A family settlement can be a consideration for execution of an agreement of sale.<sup>60</sup>

(12) Price of the Essence

The price is fixed by the contract antecedent to the conveyance. Price is of the essence of a contract of sale,<sup>61</sup> and unless the price is fixed, there is no enforceable contract, because if no price is named the law does not imply, as in the case of a sale of goods, a contract to buy at a reasonable price.<sup>62</sup> If no price is paid or promised, even a registered deed does effect a sale.<sup>63</sup> However, it is sufficient if the contract specifies definite means of ascertaining the price.<sup>64</sup> The law is stated by Fry on Specific Performance as follows:

In all sales it is evident that price is an essential ingredient, and that where it is neither ascertained nor rendered ascertainable, the contract is void for incompleteness, and incapable of enforcement. It is not however necessary that the contract should in the first instance determine the price, it may either appoint a way in which it is to be determined or it may stipulate for a fair price.

A contract for sale at 33 years' purchase of the net income is valid, and capable of specific enforcement.<sup>65</sup> The plea of absence of any sale due to sale consideration being very low is untenable, unless there is reliable evidence on record to show as to what was the market value of the land at the time of the agreement.<sup>66</sup> There should be direct or indirect evidence of any contemporaneous transaction on record.<sup>67</sup>

(13) Price how Ascertained

A clause in an agreement that the purchaser will at his own expense and cost take proper legal steps to protect and defend the properties, was held as affording sufficient and adequate consideration. The law does not require that the consideration should be immediately ascertainable in money. It is sufficient if it is ascertainable at a time when the payment is made.<sup>68</sup> Where the transaction is on the face of it complete, it cannot be regarded as a mere agreement on the ground that the price is unascertained at that time.<sup>69</sup>

Where, according to the terms of the deed, title was not to pass to the vendee on execution and registration of the deed, but was to pass only on exchange of equivalents, then title would not pass on execution of the deed.<sup>70</sup>

The fact that there is difference between two sale deeds of the same property executed at different times does not, in itself, prove that the subsequent sale deed showing a lower price, must be collusive, and lacking in bona fides. On the contrary, the mala fide purchaser generally inflates the price.<sup>71</sup>

(14) Price-Payment of

The payment of price is not necessarily a sine qua non to the completion of the sale. If the intention is that property should pass on registration, the sale is complete as soon as the deed is registered irrespective of whether the price has been paid;<sup>72</sup> and the purchaser is entitled to sue for possession although he has not paid the price.<sup>73</sup> This is clear from the words of the section,'price paid or promised or part paid or part promised.' However, when although the deed recited that the price was not paid, and it was not in fact paid and so also possession was not delivered, it was held that the inference was irresistible that no title passed.<sup>74</sup> A condition that price shall be paid in a year provided that possession was given within that time does not invalidate the sale deed.<sup>75</sup> If the price is not paid the seller cannot on that account set aside the conveyance.<sup>76</sup> He can only sue for the price;<sup>77</sup> and he will have a charge on the property for the unpaid purchase-money. Even if the plaintiff had paid only part of the money to the second defendant as sale consideration and the remaining amount which was shown to have been paid before the execution of the deed was, in fact, not paid, the sale deed would not, for that reason, become invalid on account of s 54 of the TP Act.<sup>78</sup> This is non-possessory charge, as explained in the note under s 55(4)(b), and it will not justify the seller refusing to give possession.

In a Punjab case, for the sale of immovable property, a sum of Rs 1500 was paid by cheque, but the cheque was dishonoured. It was held that if the transferee commits fraud, there is no valid transfer. Once it is found that the contract is without consideration-as in this case-it is void, and title did not pass.<sup>79</sup>

In a Patna case, it has been held that though the sale deed may recite that the consideration had been paid, the parties can adduce evidence to show that the recital was not correct. Section 92 of Indian Evidence 1872 Act does not bar such evidence. In that case, the purchaser agreed to pay consideration at the time of execution and registration, but failed to do so. It was held that he could tender or pay the money within a reasonable time, but before the vendor repudiates the contract sale. However, the vendor cannot be expected to wait indefinitely to enable the vendee to perform his part, and if the vendee does not make payment within a reasonable time, the vendor is at liberty to sell the property to another person. If after such repudiation the amount is tendered by the vendee, it is of no consequence.<sup>80</sup>

(15) Price, Challenge to Adequacy of

In Lal Achal Ram v Raja Kazim Hussain Khan,<sup>81</sup> the Privy Council laid down the principle that a stranger to a sale deed cannot dispute payment of consideration or its adequacy. The Supreme Court, in Vidhyadhar v Manikrao,<sup>82</sup> overruled Lal Achal Ram,<sup>83</sup> and while approving the view taken by High Courts of Calcutta,<sup>84</sup> Patna<sup>85</sup> and Orissa,<sup>86</sup> held that a person in his capacity as a defendant can raise any legitimate plea available to him under law to defeat the suit of the plaintiff. This would also include the plea that the sale deed by which the title to the property was intended to be conveyed to the plaintiff was void or fictitious or, for that matter, collusive, and not intended to be acted upon. The whole question would depend upon the pleadings of the parties, the nature of the suit, the nature of the deed, the evidence led by the parties in the suit, and other attending circumstances. The Supreme Court approved the principle laid down by the Calcutta, Patna and Orissa High Courts that a distinction has been drawn between a deed which was intended to be real or operative between the parties, and a deed which is fictitious in character, and was never designed as a genuine document to effect transfer of title. In such a situation, it would be open even to a stranger to impeach the deed as void and invalid on all possible grounds. It may be noted that recently, Madhya Pradesh<sup>87</sup> and Andhra Pradesh<sup>88</sup> High Courts have held that it is not open to third parties to challenge consideration for a sale. It is submitted that in view of the law laid down by the Supreme Court, these two judgments should be considered per incurium.

(16) Extrinsic Evidence of Payment

Notwithstanding an admission in a sale deed that the price has been paid, it is open to the vendor to prove that no consideration was in fact paid.<sup>89</sup> Extrinsic evidence is also admissible to show that a deed which was in form a deed of sale with a receipt for the consideration, was in reality intended to operate as a deed of gift.<sup>90</sup> If no price was in fact paid and the transfer was a reward for past cohabitation or with the object of future cohabitation, the ostensible sale deed may amount to a gift, but would be invalid under s 6(h) of TP Act.<sup>91</sup> The mere fact of non-payment of consideration will not make the sale deed fictitious, although it may sometimes be evidence that it was not intended to operate.<sup>92</sup> A compromise in which each side admits the title of the other to a part of the property in dispute does not require a written instrument, because in such case there is no transfer of title.<sup>93</sup>

(17) Time whether Essence of Contract

So far as the contract of immovable property is concerned, time is not the essence of the contract. Of course, this dictum of law is subject to two exceptions. The first one being that it should be stipulated in the contract itself that time is the essence of the contract. The second one is that the party considering the time to be the essence of the contract should put the other party on notice specifying that time is concerned the essence of the contract. Unless both these conditions are not complied with, the rule that time is not the essence of the contract, so far as it is concerned with the immovable property, shall prevail.<sup>94</sup> However, time is essence of the contract in the case of a re-conveyance, it being a concession or a privilege given to the seller to repurchase the property under the agreement.<sup>95</sup>

II-Mode of Transfer by Sale

(18) Mode of Transfer

There are only two modes of transfer by sale, and these are (1) registered instrument; and (2) delivery of possession.

The first overlaps the second, for a transfer may in all cases be made by a registered instrument. It is only in the case of tangible immovable property of value less than Rs 100, that the section allows the simpler alternative of delivery of possession. In all other cases, a registered instrument is compulsory.<sup>96</sup> The option of a simpler alternative is allowed in the case of tangible immovable property of value less than Rs 100, because the formality of a registered instrument is not considered necessary in view of the small value, and the patent evidence of the transfer afforded by the delivery of physical possession.<sup>97</sup>

The Supreme Court while discussing Uttar Pradesh Municipality Act held that unless a statute itself provides for vesting and transfer of immovable property from one person to other by acquisition or like, the question of transfer of ownership of property in the water works from the licensee to the Board could not have taken place, even if such work had been forcibly taken over, or the possession of the same had been given to the Board voluntary by the licensee.<sup>98</sup>

(19) Registration

The Registration Act 1908, does not distinguish between tangible and intangible immovable property, and makes registration optional in the case of all immovable property of value less than Rs 100. Under the said Act, a sale of intangible immovable property can only be made by a registered instrument, whatever the value of such property may be; and a sale of tangible immovable property, though of a value less than Rs 100, must also be effected by a registered instrument, unless it is effected by delivery of possession.

It is significant to note that s 54 comprehends the value of the property, as distinguished from the purported consideration of alienation, and, therefore, even if the property worth more than Rs 100 is transferred for a consideration of less than Rs 100, it cannot be done without a registered document.<sup>99</sup>

In terms of s 54 of the TP Act as amended by Uttar Pradesh Act 2 of 1997, a contract of sale can be made only by registered instrument. The use of expression 'only' here indicates that under law, contract to sale has got to be entered into by a registered instrument.<sup>1</sup> Where the sale deed requires registration, title does not pass until the sale deed is registered, even though the transfer of possession as well as payment of consideration takes place before registration of the document.<sup>2</sup>

Under Uttar Pradesh Selling of Property (Temporary Restriction of Transfer) Act, the law requires permission to be taken by the vendor by applying to the concerned authority, but such authority shall have discretion to grant or refuse the sanction, and it is immaterial that the agreement between the parties did not contain such terms as obliging the seller to take permission.<sup>3</sup>

Ordinarily, the sale deed which was registered first has to prevail in the matter of conveyance of title over others.<sup>4</sup>

The title under a sale deed passes on the date of the execution of the sale deed, even if the registration of the sale deed is completed on a later date, it must relate back to the date of sale.<sup>5</sup> Therefore, an agreement to sell executed prior to date of attachment before judgment, but registered thereafter, would prevail over such attachment.<sup>6</sup>

In a conveyance of land situated in one registration district, the inclusion of one yard of land in another registration district for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the registering authority of the latter district and without any intention to convey that one yard of land, is a device to evade the registration law, and does not constitute an effective registration and, therefore, no property passes.<sup>7</sup> The onus to prove that fraud on law of registration has been practised is on the party who alleges it.<sup>8</sup>

If immovable as well as movable property is sold for a single consideration by an unregistered deed, the sale is ineffectual not only as to the immovable, but also as to the movable property. This is because the document embodies only one transaction, and there is no separate transaction concerning the movable property.<sup>9</sup>

Where the original registered sale deed is lost, secondary evidence to prove registration, and the contents of the deed would be admissible.<sup>10</sup>

(20) Transfer by Operation of Law

Transfers by operation of law,<sup>11</sup> or by or in execution of a decree or order of a court within the meaning of s 2(d) are outside the scope of s 54, and need not be registered.

(21) No other Mode of Transfer

The provisions of this section as to modes of transfer, ie, (1) by registered instrument; and (2) by delivery of possession, are exhaustive; and a sale cannot be effected in any other way.<sup>12</sup> Title to land cannot pass by mere admission when the statute requires a deed.<sup>13</sup> An agreement of sale is not a document of transfer, nor by reason of execution of a power of attorney, the right, title or interest of an immovable property can be transferred.<sup>14</sup> The Privy Council, referring to the transfer of a zamindari estate, said that it could not be transferred except by registered instrument, and that recitals in deeds and in petitions to officials could not amount to a transfer;<sup>15</sup> and in a later case referred to the mischievous, but persistent error that proceedings for the mutation of names could affect proprietary rights.<sup>16</sup>

(22) Where the Act is Not in Force

In Punjab, where the TP Act was not in force, an oral sale was valid in all cases.<sup>17</sup> The English rule that the contract makes the intending purchaser the equitable owner was also followed.<sup>18</sup> Similarly, in the old Gwalior state, where the section was not in force, it was held that the rules contained therein were merely procedural.<sup>19</sup> When a document is executed, it must be registered.<sup>20</sup>

Paragraphs 2 and 3 of s 54 have been in force within the limits of all municipalities in Punjab since 27 April 1935,<sup>21</sup> and throughout Punjab since 1 April 1955.<sup>22</sup>

(23) Ownership when Transferred in Cases of Registration

Property does not pass, in other words, ownership is not transferred until registration is effected.<sup>23</sup> By reason of s 47 of Registration Act 1908, however, the title relates back to the date of execution for the purposes of priority, once registration is effected.<sup>24</sup> The ownership under sale deed passes on the date of the execution of the sale deed, irrespective of the date of registration.<sup>25</sup> So, a registered sale deed will not be defeated by another deed executed later, but registered earlier.<sup>26</sup> And if a deed is registered after a suit has been filed, the transfer will not be subject to lis pendens if the deed was executed before the suit was filed.<sup>27</sup>

A suit for pre-emption, which can only be filed after the completion of a sale, was held to be premature when it was filed after the deed was executed and lodged for registration, but before the registration was complete; this decision was based on the argument that as the document required registration, the transaction of sale could only be said to be complete when the registration formalities were complete.<sup>28</sup> As regards the word 'ownership', the Supreme Court has held that the word must be assigned a wider meaning in s 32(1) of the Income Tax Act 1961. A 'building owned by the assessee' used in the Income Tax Act would mean the person who having acquired possession over the building, in his own right uses the same for the purposes of the business or profession though a legal title has not been conveyed to him consistently with the requirements of TP Act, Registration Act, etc, but nevertheless is entitled to hold the property to the exclusion of all others.<sup>29</sup>

(24) Intention the True Test

The real test is the intention of the parties. In order to constitute a 'sale', the parties must intend to transfer the ownership of the property, and they must also intend that the price would be paid either in praesenti or in future. The intention is to be gathered from the recital in the sale deed, the conduct of the parties, and the evidence on record.<sup>30</sup> On the other hand, it does not follow that property passes as soon as the instrument is registered, for the true test is the intention of the parties.<sup>31</sup> Registration is prima facie proof of an intention to transfer, but it is no proof of an operative transfer if there is a condition precedent (which must be strictly proved) as to payment of consideration or delivery of the deed. Thus, the seller may retain the deed pending payment of price, and in that case there is no transfer until the price is paid, and the deed delivered.<sup>32</sup> The words 'price paid or promised' in the definition show that the payment of price is not necessarily a sine qua non to the completion of the sale.<sup>33</sup>

A combined reading of s 8 and s 54 of the TP Act suggests that though on execution and registration of a sale deed, the ownership and all interests in the property pass to the transferee, yet that would be on terms and conditions embodied in the deed indicating the intention of the party. Such intention can be gathered by intrinsic evidence, namely, from the averments on the sale deed itself, or by other attending circumstances subject, of course to the provision of s 92 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.<sup>34</sup>

In a Patna case, according to the agreement, the title did not pass at the time of execution and registration, but was to pass when the vendee paid the balance of the consideration to the vendor. The title, it was held, will pass on tender of the balance within reasonable time, irrespective of the refusal of the vendor to receive the money. The vendor had no option in the matter.<sup>35</sup>

The answer to the question whether the transferor intends to transfer ownership by mere execution or registration, or whether he intends to do so only after receipt of consideration, would depend on the intention of the parties. The intention is primarily to be determined from the recitals of the sale deed, it is only when the recitals are ambiguous that extraneous evidence is admissible.<sup>36</sup>

Again, the deed may expressly provide that the sale will be void, unless the balance of price is paid in a fixed time.<sup>37</sup> However, if the intention was that the transfer should take effect on registration, property passes although the seller has not given possession,<sup>38</sup> or the buyer has not paid the price.<sup>39</sup> In Kondu v Vishnu,<sup>40</sup> a contract of sale was registered, and it provided that on certain conditions being fulfilled it should operate as a sale-deed. The buyer took possession under the contract, and it was held to operate as a conveyance, and passed property to him as soon as he had fulfilled the conditions.

(25) Sham and Void Transaction

In an Allahabad case,<sup>41</sup> it has been held that a sale deed executed at the time of the nikah, by the bridegroom in favour of the bride's father without any money payment, and merely at the request of the bride's father who asked the bride groom to execute a sale deed for 'enhancing the status' of the bride's father, is not a sale deed, since no price is paid. In this case, the deed mentioned Rs 500 as a consideration, but the amount was never paid. Hence, the sale deed was held to be fictitious.

In a case decided by Orissa High Court,<sup>42</sup> the deed was badly drafted, which did not clearly convey title to the vendee. Terms regarding consideration and vendee's title were all inter-mingled. Possession was also not delivered to the vendee. The document remained with the executant. It was held that there was no sale. However, in another case,<sup>43</sup> where the power of attorney holder of the vendor admitted that execution of sale deed was only for defrauding creditors, it was held that such sale would be binding in view of s 43, and is not null and void. In a case decided by Punjab and Haryana High Court,<sup>44</sup> a sale by the power of attorney holder of the vendor to his sons was held to be not a bona fide transfer when it was found that neither the general power of attorney was executed by the vendor, nor any amount was shown to be paid in presence of the Sub-Registrar.

The Delhi High Court upheld the doubts regarding the genuineness of the document produced, namely the agreement to sell, the power of attorney, an affidavit and the receipt. The power of attorney did not carry any date except the date of attestation. The date on the agreement to sell was not expressed in numeral, but the month was typed in alphabets. The affidavit did not carry the date either in the body, or the verification. It was simply attested with a date. Similarly, the receipt did not carry any date. Besides neither the defendant, nor any of the witnesses produced by the defendant were able to identify the photograph of the deceased allottee or give any description with regard to his physical characteristics, such as complexion, features, age etc. The defendant also failed to show any good reason as to why he did not obtain the original letter of allotment, which would be the document of title, at the time of purchase. The court was satisfied that the defendant was not a bona fide purchaser for consideration, and the transaction was a sham.<sup>45</sup>

However, in a case dealt by Madras High Court,<sup>46</sup> a sale of property worth more than Rs 10 lakhs for a mere Rs 4.60 lakhs was held not to be a sham sale, since the sale was coupled with a covenant that the vendee would purchase the property, subject to his accepting the onerous responsibility to evict the tenant occupying the property, and get vacant possession. Where handwriting and fingerprint expert found dissimilarity in disputed and specimen thumb impression, it was held that sale deed was executed by an imposter and hence, is null and void.<sup>47</sup>

(26) Interest that cannot be Transferred

Where land is held by a person jointly with others, a transfer by him in excess of his interest is not totally invalid, but is valid to the extent of his interest in the land.<sup>48</sup> Himachal Pradesh High Court<sup>49</sup> has held that the sale deed executed by a widow is liable to be set aside since as per custom of the schedule tribe to which the widow belonged, a female could hold property till her life time or till she remarried. On evidence, it was found that she had remarried.

(27) Unregistered Deed

Where the deed is not registered, there is no transfer, and property does not pass.<sup>50</sup> This is so even if the property is tangible immovable property of value less than Rs 100.<sup>51</sup> Mere delivery of the deed will not operate as delivery of the property;<sup>52</sup> nor will a recital in the sale deed of delivery of possession suffice, for such a recital might be inserted without any attempt at fulfillment.<sup>53</sup> However, if the unregistered deed of value less than Rs 100 is accompanied by delivery of the property, the sale would be effective by virtue of delivery of possession, and would not be rendered nugatory by the unregistered deed.<sup>54</sup> The deed would be evidence of the contract of sale or of any negotiations concerning the transaction.<sup>55</sup>

If a document which is not registered is part and parcel of a single transaction which is evidenced in part by a registered instrument, then the other document must also be registered. However, if the agreement to reconvey the property can be treated as a separate transaction, then under s 54, it creates no interest in the property, and need not be registered.<sup>56</sup>

An unregistered deed may, under the judgment of the Privy Council in Varatha Pillai v Jeevarathammal,<sup>57</sup> be used as evidence of the character of possession. Twelve years' possession under an unregistered sale deed will create title by adverse possession, not only when the property is of value less than Rs 100, and s 49 of the Registration Act 1908 does not apply,<sup>58</sup> but also when it is of that value and over.<sup>59</sup> Where a sale was effected by registered instrument, other parties claimed title on the basis of an unregistered agreement, but the claim was also based on co-ownership; the claim would be sustainable.<sup>60</sup>

According to view taken by Punjab High Court, where there is no transfer of immovable property worth more than Rs 100 in favour of the plaintiff by the defendant making the former owner of the property, nor was there any deed executed in his favour and the suit by the plaintiff for declaring him to be the owner is decreed and the decree is not registered under s 17 of Registration Act, the decree would be violative of s 54, TP Act. In such a case, s 2 (d) of the TP Act does not give any protection.<sup>61</sup>

(28) Delivery of Property

In case of tangible immovable property of a value less than Rs 100, transfer may be made either by a registered document, or by delivery of possession. The delivery of possession takes place when the seller places the buyer or such person as he directs, in possession of the property.<sup>62</sup> This mode of transfer is only recognised in the case of tangible immovable property of small value, as delivery of possession is a patent act. Possession of land is given by going on the land, but it is not necessary to walk over the whole land.<sup>63</sup> Possession of a house may be given by delivery of the keys.

<sup>64</sup> Doubtful causes can only arise when the property is already in possession of the buyer. The Calcutta High Court had held in Sibendrapada v Secy of State that in such a case an oral sale was invalid;<sup>65</sup> as the essence of a transfer by delivery of property is that possession is changed. This case was doubted in a later case decided by Calcutta High Court,<sup>66</sup> where a mortgagor sold his equity of redemption of value less than Rs 100 to the mortgagee in possession by pointing out the boundaries. The court said that the mortgagor had done what he could to deliver possession, and that the oral sale was valid. In a case,<sup>67</sup> which was also a sale of an equity of redemption less in value than Rs 100 to a mortgagee in possession, the Mardas High Court held that it was sufficient that the vendor, by appropriate declaration and acts, converts the possession of the vendee as mortgagee into possession as purchaser. In the case last cited, the judges observed that it was not the intention of the TP Act to require sales of properties below Rs 100 in value to be made by registered instrument when the vendee is in possession as a tenant. However, this is clearly wrong, for if the vendee is a tenant, the sale would be of the reversion, and a registered instrument would be necessary. The decision in Sibendrapada v Secy of State,<sup>68</sup> seems to be supported by an observation of the Privy Council in Biswanath Prasad v Chandra Narayan,<sup>69</sup> that for the purpose of s 54 there must be a real delivery of the property. However, even after this decision, the Calcutta High Court has held that if the vendee is already in possession, it is sufficient if the vendor, by appropriate acts and declarations, converts permissive possession into possession as a vendee.<sup>70</sup> It has also been so held by the Lahore and Rangoon High Courts.<sup>71</sup>

(29) Usufructuary Mortgage

A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court held, by a majority, that where the property was in possession of a usufructuary mortgagee, the interest of the mortgagor was tangible property, and could be transferred without a registered instrument;<sup>72</sup> and similar views have been expressed by the Bombay,<sup>73</sup> Orissa<sup>74</sup> and Madras High Courts.<sup>75</sup> There has, however, been a conflict as to whether, in such a case, delivery can be effected only by the mortgagee giving up possession as mortgagees, or whether possession can be delivered by the vendor doing all he can under the circumstances to indicate finally and unambiguously his intention to pass the title and the possession; Allahabad<sup>76</sup> and Bombay<sup>77</sup> High Courts have taken the former view; Patna<sup>78</sup> and Orissa<sup>79</sup> High Courts, the latter view.

(30) Oral Sale

If on the date of sale, the buyer gets possession, a delivery of possession by the seller may be inferred.<sup>80</sup> Before, however, an oral sale can be said to have taken place, a court must be satisfied that the entire consideration has been paid, or that the possession of the property sought to be purchased has been delivered to the purchaser.<sup>81</sup>

When tangible immovable property of value less than Rs 100 is delivered under an oral contract of sale, the sale is complete. No title is left in the vendor, and if he subsequently executed a registered conveyance to a third person, that person gets nothing, even though the price under the oral sale has not been paid.<sup>82</sup>

(31) Delivery Plus Unregistered Sale Deed

In the case of tangible immovable property worth less than Rs 100, if the transfer is not made by delivery, there must be a registered sale deed. An unregistered deed would be invalid, and would not operate as constructive delivery.<sup>83</sup> However, if there is delivery, it is, as already stated, not rendered nugatory by the existence of an unregistered deed.<sup>84</sup> But the delivery need not be contemporaneous with the unregistered deed; it may take place some time later.<sup>85</sup>

(32) Oral Evidence

In a case,<sup>86</sup> Madras High Court had observed that the execution of an unregistered sale deed invalidated the oral sale by delivery, as the deed excluded evidence of the agreement of sale. However, this has been dissented from by the Patna High Court,<sup>87</sup> and it has been held that a sale deed though not registered is admissible as evidence of the contract of sale.<sup>88</sup> This is now made clear with reference to certain suits by the proviso inserted in s 49 of the Registration Act by Act 21 of 1929. Even if the property were worth more than Rs 100 so that there could be no oral sale, the vendee in possession under an unregistered sale deed would be protected from dispossession by the doctrine of part performance enacted in s 53A; but such an unregistered deed would not support a suit on title.<sup>89</sup>

An oral sale with delivery of possession proved by oral evidence when direct evidence to delivery of possession, was not available.<sup>90</sup>

III-Contract for Sale

(33) Contract for Sale

An Agreement to sell does not create an interest in the proposed vendee in the suit property,<sup>91</sup> but only created an enforceable right in the parties.<sup>92</sup> An 'agreement for sale' is not the same as 'sale', and the title to the property agreed to be sold, still vests in the vendor in case of an agreement for sale, but in the case of sale, title of the property vests with the purchaser. An 'agreement for sale' is an executory contract, whereas 'sale' is an executed contract. In all agreements for sale, the two most important conditions would be the date of payment of price, and date of delivery of possession of the property.<sup>93</sup> An agreement for sale of property, and a promise to transfer a property convey the same meaning and effect in law. A promise to transfer a property is an agreement for sale of a property.<sup>94</sup> A contract for the sale of immovable property differs from a contract for the sale of goods, in that the court will grant specific performance of it, unless special reasons to the contrary are shown.<sup>95</sup> The definition of contract for sale includes the settlement of the terms between the parties as one of the essentials for completion of a contract.<sup>96</sup> It is not within the competence of the guardian of a minor to bind the minor by a contract for the purchase of land; and as there is want of mutuality, the minor on attaining majority cannot obtain specific performance of the contract.<sup>97</sup> Otherwise, a contract for the sale of land is subject to the general rules applicable to all contracts; and this and other sections of the TP Act are taken as part of the India Contract Act 1872. There is no requirement of law that an agreement or contract of sale of immovable property should only be in writing. However, heavy burden lies on the party relying on such oral agreement to prove that there was consensus ad idem the parties for a concluded oral agreement for sale of immovable property, and that vital and fundamental terms for sale of immovable property were concluded between the parties orally and a written agreement, if any, to be executed subsequently would be a formal agreement incorporating the terms already settled by the oral agreement.<sup>98</sup> A contract for sale by a minor is void, but a contract for sale to a minor is valid. The note under s 6(h), 'Minor as transferee', deals with this aspect. Incidents peculiar to the sale of land are subject to s 55.

(34) Does Not of Itself Create any Interest

The law of India does not recognize equitable estates,<sup>99</sup> and the English rule that the contract makes the purchaser owner in equity of the estate, does not apply.<sup>1</sup> In Rambaran v Ram Mohit,<sup>2</sup> the Supreme Court has now held, settling a conflict of decisions, that a contract for sale does not create any interest in land. Hence, the Privy Council have held that apart from s 53A, 'an averment of the existence of a contract of sale, whether with or without an averment or possession following upon the contract, is not a relevant defence to an action for ejectment in India'.<sup>3</sup> A person who has contracted to buy land is not the owner of any interest in the land and is, therefore, not competent to apply to set aside an execution sale of the same land.<sup>4</sup> Similarly, he is not entitled to mesne profits.<sup>5</sup> It has also been held that even after a decree has been passed in a suit for specific performance, the purchaser has no interest in the property.<sup>6</sup> Section 54 of the TP Act specifically provides that the contract of sale does not, of itself create any interest in or charge on immovable property which is subject matter of contract of sale.<sup>7</sup> A person having an agreement to sell in his favour does not get any right in the property, except the right of litigation on that basis.<sup>8</sup> As by reason of an agreement for sale, no interest in an immovable property is created, the question of transfer of any interest thereby would not arise and, therefore, the prohibition of alienation created under s 4 of the Andhra Pradesh Vacant Lands in Urban Areas (Prohibition of Alienation) Act 1972 would not apply to such a transaction.<sup>9</sup>

Where a landholder is prohibited from transferring the land with effect from a certain date under the local tenancy Act, a transfer of the land subsequent to that date is void. The fact that agreements for the sale of such land were entered into before the specified date, is of no consequence. Such agreements do not create any right or interest in the property.<sup>10</sup> A contract of sale creates no interest in the property. The equitable doctrine of English law has no application in India.<sup>11</sup> A contract of sale of immovable property does not create any interest in, or charge on, such property. Where property agreed to be sold was compulsorily acquired, the vendee sued for specific performance of the contract; it was held that he was not even entitled to the compensation awarded in respect of such property.<sup>12</sup>

A contract for sale is, therefore, merely a document creating a right to obtain another document, and does not require registration.<sup>13</sup> Where the Registrar of Assurances declined to register the sale deed, executed in favour of the nominee of a party in whose favour the contract for sale was earlier made and who had signed the sale deed as a confirming party on the ground that the confirming party had acquired some interest in the land and ought to file income-tax clearance certificate as provided under S 230-A of the Income-Tax Act 1961, it was held that since the confirming party was not the owner of the property, and had not acquired any right, title or interest in the property, on the strength of mere agreement to sell the property, the question of his obtaining income tax clearance certificate under s 230-A of the Income Tax Act did not at all arise.<sup>14</sup>

An agreement relating to the sale of Deodar, Kail and Rai trees showed that the parties neither knew the number of trees sold, nor the identity of the trees owned. Though the land had been identified by khasra numbers, its actual demarcation was not known. Clause 1 of the agreement clearly showed that the ownership in respect of each had yet to be ascertained. Only the price of the different kinds of trees of various girth was being settled. Clause 2 repeated the same fact by stating 'whatever trees of whichever kind are found.' It was not known as to how many trees were of Deodar, and how many were of Kail or Rai. Clause 3 of the agreement showed that the trees had still to be identified, and to be got marked from the forest department. The revenue department had to identify and sanction their felling and cutting. This had got to be done by the sellers as well as the buyers. The purpose of buying these trees was not only to cut them, but also to take them away for sale. It was held, that the agreement in question was not a sale, but only an agreement to sell. The facts indicated that the contract was for the sale of unascertained goods. Even if it is assumed for the sake of argument that the agreement in question was for the sale of specified goods, the trees were not in a deliverable state, unless and until the girth of each tree was measured, the forest department marked it as fit for cutting, and the revenue department identified and gave permission for felling and cutting. The requisite permission for various departments could be obtained only by the owners.<sup>15</sup>

It has, however, been held that though a contract of sale does not, of itself, create an interest in property, there is transfer of ownership, when, in addition, a part of the purchase price has also been paid.<sup>16</sup> This decision, it is submitted, is not correct, for ownership can pass only on registration or delivery of possession.

The concept of two classes of ownership—legal and equitable—is alien to Indian law, which recognises only one owner. However, many of the English equitable principles have taken statutory form in India. From the ultimate paragraph of s 54, and the ultimate and penultimate paragraphs of s 40, it is clear that though a contract for the sale of immovable property does not create an interest in, or a charge on, the property, it creates an obligation annexed to the ownership of the property, which may be enforced against a transferee without notice or a voluntary transferee.<sup>17</sup> In the absence of registered sale deed, nobody can call himself as owner by purchase on the basis of agreement to sell, and the power of attorney executed by the alleged vendor in favour of the prospective purchaser cum attorney.<sup>18</sup>

(35) Adverse Possession

Even after the contract to sell, title clearly resides in the vendor, and even though the proposed vendee has taken possession, his possession is under the contract and is, therefore, clearly permissive. In Achal Reddy v Ramakrishna Reddiar,<sup>19</sup> the Supreme Court held that: 'In the case of an agreement of sale, the party who obtains possession acknowledges title of the vendor even though the agreement of sale may be invalid. It is an acknowledgement and recognition of the title of the vendor which excludes the theory of adverse possession... Adverse possession implies that it commenced in wrong and is maintained against right. When the commencement and continuance of possession is legal and proper, referable to a contract, it cannot be adverse.' Supreme Court has further held in Thakur Kishan Singh v Arvind Kumar<sup>20</sup> that mere possession for howsoever length of time does not result in converting the permissive possession into adverse possession. In Roop Singh v Ram Singh,<sup>21</sup> the Supreme Court has gone a step further, and held that once it is admitted by implication that the plaintiff came in possession of the land lawfully under the agreement and continued to remain in possession till the date of the suit, the plea of adverse possession would not be available to the defendant, unless it has been asserted and pointed out that hostile animus of retaining possession as an owner after getting possession of the land existed.

(36) Attachment

There was a conflict of decision as to whether the obligation created by a contract for sale will prevail over claims enforceable under an attachment.<sup>22</sup> The matter is, however, set at rest by the Supreme Court holding that a sale deed having been executed prior to attachment before judgment, though registered subsequently, will prevail over attachment before judgment.<sup>23</sup> The Supreme Court has gone even to the extent of holding that not only a sale deed, but even an agreement of sale will prevail over attachment before judgment made subsequent to such agreement of sale.<sup>24</sup>

(37) Equities of Person Contracting to Buy

If the transaction is still in the stage of contract, the buyer, even if he has paid the price or part of the price and even if he has taken possession, is not the owner, and the property is still in the seller. However, these circumstances may give rise to equities in favour of the buyer. A buyer who has paid the price or part of the price in anticipation of a conveyance is entitled under s 55(6)(b) to a charge on the property for the amount paid. If the contract is still capable of specific performance, the buyer may file a suit for specific performance, and complete his title. If the buyer is in possession in pursuance of the contract, he is protected from dispossession by the right enacted in s 53A. However, if s 53A does not apply, 'an averment of the existence of a contract of sale, whether with or without possession following upon the contract', is not a defence to an action for ejectment in India.<sup>25</sup>

(38) Estoppel

An admission that land has been sold will not operate as an estoppel so as to do away with the necessity for a registered conveyance.<sup>26</sup> Title to land will not pass by mere admission when the Act requires a conveyance.<sup>27</sup> However, it has been held that s 54 has no application when there is clear evidence that following the contract for sale, the proposed purchaser was put into physical possession, and he continued to do so uninterruptedly till execution of sale deed and formal delivery.<sup>28</sup>

(39) Mahomedan Law

The exception in favour of rules of Mahomedan law in s 2(d) only refers to such rules as differ from the general rules contained in chapter II. However, s 54 occurs in chapter III and, therefore, applies to Mahomedans.<sup>29</sup> Under the Mahomedan law rule, the execution of an instrument of sale is in no case necessary and the sale becomes absolute on payment of price and delivery of possession,<sup>30</sup> but the section renders this rule obsolete where the TP Act is in force. In cases where the Mahomedan right of pre-emption is claimed, there was a conflict of judicial opinion<sup>31</sup> as to whether the right arises when the sale is complete under Mahomedan law, or only when it is complete under the provisions of this section. The rule generally applied was that it was the intention of the parties which determined the system of law applicable, and the date when the sale can be said to be complete;<sup>32</sup> and this rule had been approved by the Privy Council.<sup>33</sup> The Supreme Court has,<sup>34</sup> however, concluded the question and held, approving the dissenting judgment of J Mahmood in Janki v Girjadat,<sup>35</sup> that if the TP Act was in force, no sale could be said to be complete, unless the provisions of s 54 were complied with, regardless of the intention of the parties. There was no justification for importing any rule of personal law to override the express provisions of the TP Act.

The transaction called the hiba-bil-iwaz<sup>36</sup> has been held to be a sale, so that if the property is immovable property of the value of Rs 100 or upwards, it must be effected by a registered instrument.<sup>37</sup> It has been held in Oudh that a hiba-bil-iwaz by which a Mahomedan transfers property to his wife in satisfaction of dower debt, is not a sale,<sup>38</sup> and that all cases of hiba-bil-iwaz are not necessarily sales.<sup>39</sup> A dower debt being a debt payable by husband to wife, a gift in lieu of dower debt cannot be held to be valid, inasmuch as repayment of dower debt being consideration, no property

(40) Reconveyance

In a sale coupled with an agreement to re-convey, there is no relation of debtor and creditor, nor is the price charged upon the property is conveyed, but the sale is subject to an obligation to re-transfer the property within the period specified. Distinction between mortgage by conditional sale, and sale with condition to re-convey is the relationship of debtor and creditor, and the transfer being a security for the debt.<sup>41</sup> An option to re-purchase is a privilege or concession,<sup>42</sup> because option by its very nature is dependent entirely on the volition of the person granted the option. He may or may not exercise it. Its exercise cannot be compelled by the person granting the option. It is because of this one-sidedness or'unilaterality' that the right is strictly construed.<sup>43</sup>

It is well-settled that time is an essence of the contract in the case of a re-conveyance, since it is a concession or privilege given to the seller to re-purchase the property under the agreement.<sup>44</sup> An agreement of sale even though described as a re-conveyance, does not by itself mean that it is an option to repurchase, nor does it in any way alter the substance of the deed. It merely records a historical fact—that the property which is to be sold was being purchased by the person who used to be the owner. The agreement remains an agreement for sale of immovable property, and must be governed by the same provisions of law.<sup>45</sup>

It is true that it is customary to include a recital regarding the agreement of re-conveyance in the sale deed itself. However, where there was an agreement preceding the sale deed and that agreement contained such a clause, and a sale deed, was executed consequent thereto, the absence of reference to the agreement of re-conveyance in the sale deed would not lead to the inference that the said right was given up by the plaintiff, executant of sale deed. Unless there is a detailed plea, and also evidence that before execution of the sale deed there was novation, and parties expressly agreed to give a go-bye to the agreement of re-conveyance, no inference would be drawn that the agreement of re-conveyance contained in the agreement of sale which preceded the sale-deed was given go-bye.<sup>46</sup> In another case, the question arose about the genuineness of the document of a re-conveyance in respect of two properties. The sale deed did not contain any stipulation about the re-conveyance, however subsequent deed for re-conveyance was executed by the agent of the purchaser. The seller expressed the absence of stipulation of re-conveyance in the sale deed as per the advice given by their legal advisor. Further, the existence of re-conveyance deed was supported by a letter returned by seller to the purchaser, besides the parties re-conveyed one of the two properties within the time limit fixed under the deed of re-conveyance, and for the same amount as stipulated in the re-conveyance deed. It was held that the re-conveyance deed was genuine.<sup>47</sup>

In the instant case, it was found that the sale deed is in reality not an outright sale, but is a anomalous mortgage, and the agreement to sell is in reality a supplement to the anomalous mortgage. It was agreed between the mortgagors of the one side and the mortgagee on the other that the amount of loan would carry interest at the rate of 18 per cent per annum, and in pursuance of which agreement the possession of the suit property was delivered to mortgagee, and it was further agreed between them that after completion of five years, the accounts would be settled and on payment of balance amount, if any, the mortgager would re-convey and re-deliver the possession of suit property to the mortgagors.<sup>48</sup> Where it was found that there was no recital in document as to whether amount paid by transferee was towards mortgage consideration or loan amount, and there was no stipulation of interest and entire property was given in possession under document to transferee, which he was continuously enjoying, and transferee got the property mutated in his name, and further transferor never exercised his right to repurchase property or offered to pay the amount back, it was held that the transaction is a simple conditional sale of re-purchase, and not mortgage with conditional sale.<sup>49</sup>

Rights and Liabilities of buyer and seller.

--In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the buyer and seller of immovable property respectively are subject to the liabilities, and have the rights, mentioned in the rules next following, or such of them as are applicable to the property sold:

- (1) The seller is bound--
  - (a) to disclose to the buyer any material defect in the property or in the seller's title thereto of which the seller is, and the buyer is not, aware, and which the buyer could not with ordinary care discover;
  - (b) to produce to the buyer on his request for examination all documents of title relating to the property which are in the seller's possession or power;
  - (c) to answer to the best of his information all the relevant questions put to him by the buyer in respect of the property or the title thereto;
  - (d) on payment or tender of the amount due in respect of the price, to execute a proper conveyance of the property when the buyer tenders it to him for execution at a proper time and place;
  - (e) between the date of the contract of sale and the delivery of the property, to take as much care of the property and all documents of title relating thereto which are in his possession as an owner of ordinary prudence would take of such property and documents;
  - (f) to give, on being so required, the buyer, or such person as he directs, such possession of the property as its nature admits;
  - (g) to pay all public charges and rent accrued due in respect of the property up to the date of the sale, the interest on all encumbrances on such property due on such date, and, except where the property is sold subject to encumbrances, to discharge all encumbrances on the property then existing.
- (2) The seller shall be deemed to contract with the buyer that the interest which the seller professes to transfer to the buyer subsists and that he has power to transfer the same:

Provided that, where the sale is made by a person in a fiduciary character, he shall be deemed to contract with the buyer that the seller has done no act whereby the property is encumbered or whereby he is hindered from transferring it.

The benefit of the contract mentioned in this rule shall be annexed to, and shall go with, the interest of the transferee as such, and may be enforced by every person in whom that interest is for the whole or any part thereof from time to time vested.
- (3) Where the whole of the purchase-money has been paid to the seller, he is also bound to deliver to the buyer all documents of title relating to the property which are in the seller's possession or power:

Provided that, (a) where the seller retains any part of the property comprised in such documents, he is entitled to retain them all, and, (b) where the whole of such property is sold to different buyers, the buyer of the lot of greatest value is entitled to such documents. But in case (a) the seller, and in case (b) the buyer, of the lot of greatest value, is bound, upon every reasonable request by the buyer, or by any of the other buyers, as the case may be, and at the cost of the person making the request, to produce the said documents and furnish such true copies thereof or extracts therefrom as he may require; and in the meantime, the seller, or the buyer of the lot of greatest value, as the case may be, shall keep the said documents safe, uncancelled and undefaced, unless prevented from so doing by fire or other inevitable accident.

- (4) The seller is entitled--
- (a) to the rents and profits of the property till the ownership thereof passes to the buyer;
  - (b) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer before payment of the whole of the purchase-money, to a charge upon the property in the hands of the buyer, any transferee without consideration or any transferee with notice of the non-payment, for the amount of the purchase-money, or any part thereof remaining unpaid, and for interest on such amount or part from the date on which possession has been delivered.
- (5) The buyer is bound-
- (a) to disclose to the seller any fact as to the nature or extent of the seller's interest in the property of which the buyer is aware, but of which he has reason to believe that the seller is not aware, and which materially increases the value of such interest;
  - (b) to pay or tender, at the time and place of completing the sale, the purchase-money to the seller of such person as he directs: provided that, where the property is sold free from encumbrances, the buyer may retain out of the purchase-money the amount of any encumbrances on the property existing at the date of the sale, and shall pay the amount so retained to the persons entitled thereto;
  - (c) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer, to bear any loss arising from the destruction, injury or decrease in value of the property not caused by the seller;
  - (d) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer, as between himself and the seller, to pay all public charges and rent which may become payable in respect of the property, the principal moneys due on any encumbrances subject to which the property is sold, and the interest thereon afterwards accruing due.
- (6) The buyer is entitled-
- (a) where the ownership of the property has passed to him, to the benefit of any improvement in, or increase in value of, the property, and to the rents and profits thereof;
  - (b) unless he has improperly declined to accept delivery of the property, to a charge on the property, as against the seller and all persons claiming under him, to the extent of the seller's interest in the property, for the amount of any purchase-money properly paid by the buyer in anticipation of the delivery and for interest on such amount; and, when he properly declines to accept the delivery, also for the earnest (if any) and for the costs (if any) awarded to him of a suit to compel specific performance of the contract or to obtain a decree for its rescission.

An omission to make such disclosures as are mentioned in this section, paragraph (1), clause (a), and paragraph (5), clause (a), is fraudulent.

(1) Amendments

The following amendments have been made by Act 20 of 1929. In s 55(1)(a), the words 'or in the seller's title thereto' have been inserted. These give effect to the decision in Haji Essa v Dayabhai<sup>50</sup> that a material defect in the property includes a defect in the title of the seller. In s 55(4)(b), the words 'any transferee without consideration or any transferee with notice of the non-payment' have been inserted after the words 'to a charge upon the property in the hands of the buyer'. The effect is that the unpaid seller's charge is available not only against the buyer, but against a transferee from the buyer with notice of a gratuitous transferee. At the end of the sale clause, the words 'from the date on which possession has been delivered' have been added to indicate that the buyer is liable for interest of unpaid price only from the date when he is put in possession. In s 55(6)(b), the words 'with notice of the payment' have been omitted. This makes the charge of the buyer for price prepaid effective not only against the seller, but against all persons claiming under him, irrespective of notice.<sup>51</sup>

(2) In the Absence of a Contract to the Contrary

Note (56) under the same head may be referred to.

(3) Rights and Liabilities

The section set forth the rights and liabilities of the buyer and seller--

- (1) Before completion.
- (2) After completion.

These rights and liabilities are as follows:

(i) Before completion

	Seller's liabilities		Buyer's liabilities
s 55(l)(a)	To disclose material defects.	s 55(5)(a)	To disclose facts materially increasing value.
s 55(l)(b)	To produce title deeds.
s 55(l)(c)	To answer question as to title.
s 55(l)(d)	To execute conveyance.	s 55(5)(b)	To pay price.
s 55(l)(e)	To take care of the property.
s 55(l)(g)	To pay outgoings.
	Seller's right		Buyer's right
s 55(4)(a)	To take rents and profits.	s 55(6)(b)	Charge for price prepaid.

The rights and liabilities before completion are all contractual with the exception of the seller's right to take the rents and profits under s 55(4)(a), which is a right the seller has because he continues to be the owner after the contract. The seller's liabilities -- to produce title deeds under s 55(l)(b); to answer question as to title under s 55(l)(c); to execute conveyance under s 55(l)(d); and to disclose defects under s 55(l)(a); and the buyer's liability to disclose facts materially increasing the value under s 55(5)(a) -- merge in the conveyance. There is no remedy on them after the conveyance except on the ground of fraud, but omission of disclosure is expressly declared to be fraudulent. The buyer's liability to pay the price under s 55(5)(b) does not merge in the conveyance, and after conveyance is enforced by the seller's charge for unpaid price, in terms of s (55)(4)(b). Conversely, if the buyer has paid purchase money before conveyance, he has a charge under s 55(6)(b). The seller's liability to take care of the property under s 55(l)(e) and to pay outgoings under s 55(l)(g) are obligations collateral to the contract, which do not merge in the conveyance and can be enforced after completion.

(ii) After completion

	Seller's liabilities		Buyer's liabilities
s 55(l)(f)	To give possession.	s 55(5)(c)	To bear loss to the property.
s 55(2)	Implied covenant for title.
s 55(3)	To deliver title deeds on receipt of price.	s 55(5)(d)	To pay outgoings.

s 55(4) (b)	Charge for price not paid.	s 55(6)(a)	Benefit of increment.

The buyer's rights and liabilities after completion--s 55(6)(a), s 55(5)(c), and s 55(5)(d)--are not contractual, but are incidents of the ownership that has been transferred to him. The seller's charge for unpaid price under s 55(4)(b) is a security for the enforcement of the buyer's liability to pay the price in terms of s 55(5)(b) which has not merged in the conveyance. The liability to give possession under s 55(1) (f), and to guarantee title as per s 55(2) are contractual liabilities implied in the conveyance.

(4) Open Contract for Sale

When nothing is said as to the way in which the seller shall prove his title, and the contract for sale merely fixes the price which is to be paid for a certain piece of land, it is said to be an open contract.<sup>52</sup> The section sets forth the rights and liabilities that are implied in an open contract for sale, ie, a contract in which the terms are not subject to particular conditions. They are merely an elaboration of the fundamental duties of the parties which are that the seller must make out a good title, execute a conveyance, and deliver the property and title deeds to the buyer; while the buyer must examine title, accept it if good, draft a conveyance for the seller to execute, and pay the price.

These implied conditions are usually varied and supplemented by particular conditions which are comprised in the comprehensive phrases 'contract to the contrary.' A contract to execute a sale deed 'containing the necessary stipulations' means a contract for sale on the conditions implied by this section.<sup>53</sup>

(5) Section 55(1) (a)--Seller's Duty of Disclosure

A contract for sale of land is not a contract uberrimae fidei; but although the duty of disclosure is not absolute, the seller is under an obligation to disclose latent defects of which he is aware. This is the same rule as in the sale of goods under s 16 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act 1930. In Carlish v Salt<sup>54</sup> J Joyce said:

In the case of a sale of the chattel, the law as stated by Bramwell, B in Horsfall v Thomas<sup>55</sup> is that if there be a defect known to the manufacturer, and which cannot be discovered on inspection, he is bound to point it out. Upon consideration of the authorities, I am of opinion that the vendor of real estate is under a similar obligation with respect to a material defect in the title or the subject of the sale, which defect is exclusively within its knowledge, and which the purchaser could not be expected to discover for himself with the care ordinarily used in such transactions.

A latent defect is a defect which the buyer could not with ordinary care discover for himself. There is no duty to disclose defects of which the buyer has actual,<sup>56</sup> or constructive notice.<sup>57</sup> As to patent defects and defects of which the seller is unaware, the maxim of caveat emptor applies. However, a mutual mistake as to the matter of fact essential to the agreement will render the agreement void.<sup>58</sup>

It has been held that there is a patent defect where it is obvious that there is a right of way enjoyed by some third person or by the public in general;<sup>59</sup> but that the existence of a public right of way is a latent defect if the land is not such as to indicate clearly a right of public user.<sup>60</sup> The ruinous condition of a house is a patent defect.<sup>61</sup> The buyer can see these on inspection and if he is not vigilant and omits to take inspection, he has only himself to blame. An underground culvert or drain is a latent defect.<sup>62</sup>

Material defect

The latent defect whether of property or of title must be material. This is decided with reference to the principle laid down by CJ Tindall in Flight v Booth<sup>63</sup> that it must be of such a nature that it might be reasonably supposed that if the buyer had been aware of it he might not have entered into the contract at all, for he would be getting something different from what he contracted to buy. The terms of the contract will be referred to in order to decide whether the case falls within the rules in this case. Where land was sold for building purposes, an underground drain was held to be a material defect,<sup>64</sup> but not when a house, and land were sold mainly for residence.<sup>65</sup>

Defects in property

It was at one time doubted whether this phrase included defect in title, but the Bombay High Court held that it did,<sup>66</sup> and the amending Act of 1929 has adopted this decision by adding the words 'or in the seller's title thereto.' A defect may be of property or of title and a defect of property may also be a defect of title, for a right of way across land would be a good objection to title. Defects of property are defects which interfere with the physical enjoyment of the land sold. Trifling defects such as rotten boards or joints need not be disclosed.<sup>67</sup>

Defect in title

Defects in title are always latent defects, for a seller's title is a matter exclusively within his own knowledge and he is bound to state it explicitly, and to tell the entire truth which is relevant to the matter in hand.<sup>68</sup> In the absence of words to the contrary, the presumption is that the seller is giving a title free from reasonable doubt and this rule is implied in s 25(b) of the Specific Relief Act 1877, which corresponds to s 17 of the Specific Relief Act 1963. A title free from reasonable doubt is a marketable title which can at all times be forced upon an unwilling purchaser.<sup>69</sup>

The following are instances of a defect in the seller's title: an encumbrance;<sup>70</sup> a notification of intended acquisition under the Land Acquisition Act;<sup>71</sup> a restrictive covenant;<sup>72</sup> an easement;<sup>73</sup> a party--wall notice and award throwing upon the owner the liability to contribute to rebuilding;<sup>74</sup> unusually onerous covenants in a sale of lease--hold property;<sup>75</sup> or the fact that the agreed root of title is a voluntary conveyance.<sup>76</sup> In a Bombay case<sup>77</sup> it was held that an outstanding equitable mortgage was not a material defect in the title, as the amount of the mortgage was less than the price and could be cleared by the vendor. Where a person sells property not belonging to him, it is clearly a case of fraud and not a mere material defect in title. The case is outside s 55(l)(a), and such a person must make good the loss suffered by the other party.<sup>78</sup>

Non-disclosure

If before he has accepted the conveyance the buyer discovers a material defect which has not been disclosed, he may claim damages or rescind the contract for misrepresentation. He may also resist a suit for specific performance. The duty of disclosure merges in the conveyance, but if the buyer has accepted the conveyance he has a remedy in damages on the covenant for title.<sup>79</sup> The fact that the buyer knew of the defect in title of the seller prior to the purchase, does not prevent him from suing for damages for breach of the covenant.<sup>80</sup> Again, as non-disclosure of a material defect is a fraud, he may sue to set aside the sale and claim damages.

Illustrations

- (1) A sells to B an enclosed field. Before accepting the conveyance, B discovers that the public have a right of way across the field of which there is no visible indication on the land. This is a defect both on the property and in the seller's title. A not having disclosed this defect, B may refuse to complete and claim damages. He can also resist a suit for specific performance.
- (2) A sells a property to B. After he has accepted the conveyance, B discovers that under a decree for partition a portion of the property had been allotted to C. A's omission to disclose the decree is fraudulent and B may sue to set aside the conveyance.<sup>81</sup>

The onus of showing a failure to disclose a defect in title is on the purchaser.<sup>82</sup>

(6) Section 55(l) (b)--production of title deeds

Under this sub-section the seller is to produce his title deeds for inspection, and not for delivery. Title deeds are delivered on receipt of the whole of the purchase money under s 55(3). This sub-section requires the seller to produce the title deeds for inspection by the buyer in order that the buyer should satisfy himself as to title, but it makes no reference to the title abstract.<sup>83</sup>

There is no obligation to produce title deeds unless the buyer makes a request.<sup>84</sup> They must be produced within a reasonable time, and this is so even if the agreement requires them to be produced 'forthwith'.<sup>85</sup> However, the buyer must not omit to take inspection, otherwise he will be held to have constructive notice of matters which he would have discovered, if he had investigated the title.<sup>86</sup>

The words 'in the seller's possession or power' indicate that the seller must produce not only documents which are in his possession, but also in his power. They do not enable a purchaser to insist on the production of documents not in the possession or power of the seller or to claim expenses of incurring a search for them in the office of the Collector or Registrar. Such a right can be derived by an express term of contract.<sup>87</sup>

(7) Section 55(1) (c)--Requisitions

When the documents of title are produced under the last sub-section the buyer examines them and if he is not satisfied, he makes requisitions or objections. These are (1) requisitions on title; (2) requisitions as to matters relating to conveyance; and (3) merely inquiries.

Requisitions on title are objections purporting that the documents do not show the agreed title or that the documents are not efficacious, ie, not duly attested or not executed by parties having the capacity to convey, or that the identity of the property is not established, or that further evidence is necessary. Examples of such requisitions will be found in the cases mentioned in the footnote herewith.<sup>88</sup>

Requisitions as to matters relating to conveyance refer to such matters as the joinder or concurrence of parties to the conveyance.

Inquiries are for the protection of the buyer, and call attention to possible omissions of disclosure by the seller, and seek information on such points as easements, party walls and insurance.

The conditions of sale usually contain a stipulation requiring requisitions to be made within a certain time of the delivery of the abstract. This stipulation is construed as referring to the delivery of a perfect abstract, ie, an abstract which shows all the documents, and gives all the facts upon which the vendor's title is based.<sup>89</sup> Such a stipulation cannot operate to thrust upon a purchaser a property to which no title is shown.<sup>90</sup>

Answers to requisitions

The seller is bound to answer all requisitions which are relevant to the title and which are specific. He is not bound to answer a general inquiry as to whether there was within the knowledge of the seller or his solicitor any settlement, deed, fact, omission or encumbrance affecting the property, and not disclosed by the abstract.<sup>91</sup> He is bound to answer to the best of his information questions regarding the income or rental of the property.<sup>92</sup> The contract may give the vendor an express power of rescission if requisitions are made which he is unwilling to comply with. But even so, the vendor is not relieved of his duty to make out his title.<sup>93</sup>

Where the vendor has failed to answer requisitions, the purchaser is entitled to rescind the contract; he need not formally demand answers or make time the essence.<sup>94</sup>

The duty to answer requisitions is altogether distinct from the duty of disclosure under s 55(l)(a), for the omission of the buyer to make a requisition will not absolve the seller if he has not made a full disclosure.<sup>95</sup>

Where a vendor sells land under an open contract, he cannot compel the purchaser to accept a statutory declaration as sufficient evidence to contradict statements appearing in the documents of title, such as the consideration stated in a deed which shows prima facie that the deed is insufficiently stamped.<sup>96</sup>

Waiver of requisitions

The buyer may waive requisitions. Waiver may be express, or may be implied from conduct as when a buyer does not press a requisition that has been made, or ask for time to pay the price;<sup>97</sup> or when he enters into possession or pays the whole or part of the price.<sup>98</sup>

Such conduct constitutes waiver as it shows an acceptance of title. However, the question is one of fact to be decided on all the circumstances of the case, and payment of price and entry into possession will not have this effect if the contract provides that this may be done before completion.<sup>99</sup> Such implied waiver only refers to the title shown in the abstract or the documents produced, but not to an extraneous defect subsequently discovered,<sup>1</sup> or to an encumbrance removable by the seller.<sup>2</sup>

(8) Section 55(1) (d)--Execution of Conveyance

The execution of the conveyance, and the payment of price are reciprocal duties to be performed simultaneously.<sup>3</sup> If either party sues for specific performance, he must show that he was ready and willing to perform.

It is the duty of the buyer to tender a conveyance,<sup>4</sup> but unless time is made the essence, it need not be tendered to any particular time.<sup>5</sup>

Both the obligation to tender a conveyance,<sup>6</sup> and to pay the price at the time of execution,<sup>7</sup> are, of course, subject to a contract to the contrary.

Where on the sale and purchase of land, the description in the contract affords a sufficient and satisfactory identification of the property sold without a plan, the purchaser cannot require, at the expense of the vendor, a plan to supplement the description.<sup>8</sup>

There is no indication in the section as to what is the proper time and place for execution. The time is usually settled by the contract, and if it is not so settled, the proper time is the date when the seller makes out his title. If a time is fixed, and an unreasonable delay occurs, the proper course is to give notice making time the essence of the contract.<sup>9</sup> In India, in the absence of any express terms, the buyer has to pay the cost of the stamp.<sup>10</sup>

If there has been a re-sale by the buyer and the conveyance is direct to the sub-purchaser, the seller may require the original buyer to be a party to the conveyance if there is a difference of price;<sup>11</sup> but not otherwise, for an ordinary contract of sale is to convey to the purchaser or to such persons as the purchaser shall direct.<sup>12</sup>

The payment of price is usually acknowledged in the conveyance, and a receipt also is endorsed upon it, and attested by the seller's solicitors.

The purchaser on receipt of the executed conveyance presents it for registration. The seller had to admit execution before the Registrar, and he should also be called upon to admit receipt of the price.<sup>13</sup>

(9) Section 55(l)(e)--Care of Property

Although a contract of sale transfers no right in rem (as it does in English law) yet, as already explained,<sup>14</sup> it imposes upon the seller a personal obligation in the nature of a trust, and though he is still the owner, this sub-section imposes on him the same duties as are imposed upon a trustee by s 15 of the Trusts Act. The English law imposes the same liability;<sup>15</sup> and in Phillips v Silvester<sup>16</sup> Lord Selborne said that:

the vendor is pro tanto a trustee in possession for the purchaser, although he holds the purchaser at arm's length, and a trustee, therefore, who is bound to do those things which he would be bound to do if he were a trustee for any other person.

The seller must do what a prudent owner ought to do, and keep the property in reasonable repair and protect it from injury by trespassers.<sup>17</sup>

The obligation declared by this sub-section is one collateral to the contract, and does not merge in the conveyance. Section 55(5)(c) also implies that after completion the buyer is not responsible for any loss caused by the seller. If the seller neglects his duty, the buyer is entitled to compensation to be deducted from the purchase money; and after completion, the buyer may recover damages.<sup>18</sup>

The seller must also take care of the title deeds, for loss of the deeds depreciates the value of the property, and is damage done to the estate.<sup>19</sup> On completion he must deliver the title-deeds to the buyer.<sup>20</sup>

(10) Section 55(l)(f)--Possession

It is the duty of the seller to give possession and not to leave the buyer to get possession for himself,<sup>21</sup> notwithstanding a condition in the sale deed that if no possession is given the vendee may take steps to take possession.<sup>22</sup> The implied contract to give possession may be enforced by a suit for specific performance.<sup>23</sup> The vendee, however, has no right to obtain from the vendor expenses which he may have incurred subsequent to the sale in obtaining the possession of the property.<sup>24</sup>

It is not necessary in a suit for specific performance either to separately claim possession, or for the court to pass a decree for possession. A decree for specific performance of contract includes everything incidental to be done by one party or another to complete the sale transaction, the rights and obligation of the parties in such a matter being indicated by s 55 of TP Act. The most important part of such a decree is the portion where the court directs that the contract to be specifically performed, and the details which follow do not in any way limit the jurisdiction of the executing court to take particular steps which were mentioned in the decree, but all other steps which ought to be taken for giving full effect to the decree of specific performance are not only within the competence of the court, but the court is bound to assist the party to the decree.<sup>25</sup> The relief of possession is inherent in the relief for specific performance of the contract, and the buyer is bound to give such possession to the seller as he has, as provided for under s 55 of the TP Act.<sup>26</sup>

The sub-section does not say when the seller should give possession, but s 55(4)(a) shows that possession should be given when ownership passes to the buyer.<sup>27</sup> This would be at the time of execution of the sale deed,<sup>28</sup> unless it was the intention of the parties that the transfer of ownership should be deferred till the payment of the price.<sup>29</sup> If that is not the intention, the seller cannot refuse possession because the price has not been paid.<sup>30</sup> However, the right of the buyer to obtain possession under s 55(l)(f), and the right of the seller to realize the unpaid balance of the price under s 55(4)(b), may be enforced in the same action. The High Court of Calcutta, Allahabad and Rangoon have held that if the buyer sues for possession, he may be required to deposit the balance in court within a time specified, failing which his suit will be dismissed.<sup>31</sup> But the High Court of Madras has held that the vendee is entitled to possession, and cannot be put to equitable terms as to payment of price.<sup>32</sup> The Bombay High Court has held that in a suit by the vendee to recover possession, the court is not competent to pass a decree for possession conditional upon payment of the unpaid price, but may incorporate in the decree for possession, the statutory charge under s 55(4)(b) for the unpaid price.<sup>33</sup> Where the vendor is not in a position to give possession of the property agreed to be sold by him to the purchaser, the purchaser will be entitled to rescind the contract, and claim the advance that may have been paid.<sup>34</sup>

As its nature permits

These words refer to physical possession in the case of tangible property, and symbolical in the case of intangible property. (Property already in the possession of the buyer is dealt with in the note 'Delivery of Property' under s 54.) Possession is a flexible term, and does not necessarily import personal occupation. So when a buyer had notice of a tenancy<sup>35</sup> or of a usufructuary mortgage,<sup>36</sup> he was only entitled to symbolical possession. In this connection it may be noted that a direction by the mortgagor to the tenants to pay rents to the mortgagee constitutes a usufructuary mortgage.<sup>37</sup> Ordinarily, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, if the agreement is to sell a house in which the seller has the sole and absolute interest, the possession that its nature permits delivery of, is vacant possession. The possession of tenants or trespassers in the house cannot affect the nature of the property. Thus, when property is sold with all rights and free from encumbrances, the seller is bound to give vacant possession of the property which is occupied by the trespassers.<sup>38</sup> It has been held that in the case of agricultural land, the vendor must normally give vacant possession.<sup>39</sup>

(11) Section 55(1) (g)--Outgoings Pending Completion

The liability imposed upon the seller by this sub-section is collateral to the contract, and may be enforced after completion. The same liability exists under English law. It results from his duty under s 55(l)(e) to take care of the property pending completion. The English phrase 'outgoings' includes reasonable repairs; but under the TP Act the seller's liability for such is attributable to his duty under s 55(l)(e) to take care of the property. The seller who repairs is, under s 55(4)(a), entitled to the rents and profits for the same period, ie, between contract and completion, as these constitute the fund out of which he would bear the expense. By agreement, the parties may agree that the vendor shall pay all public charges due at the date of the delivery of possession instead of at the date of the sale.<sup>40</sup> When the vendor has contracted to sell the property free from encumbrances, but due to the non-payment of interest since the contract of sale on the mortgage already created on the property, the mortgage dues have been considerably increased, and the vendor is unable to deliver possession of the property free from encumbrance, he cannot be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong.<sup>41</sup>

(12) Encumbrances

If the property is not sold to encumbrances, the seller's duty to discharge an encumbrance may also be referred to after completion of the covenant for title implied by s 55(2). In Nathu Khan v Burtonath,<sup>42</sup> the Privy Council said:

The purchase deed contained the express declaration that the property was sold free from encumbrances and consequently by s 55(l)(g), sub-section (2) of the Transfer of Property Act the vendor must have been deemed to contract with the buyers that he had power to transfer the property so sold, and consequently, that the property was free from burdens.

If the buyer has to discharge such an encumbrance owing to the seller's default, the seller is liable, under s 69 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, for the moneys paid by the buyer to clear his title.<sup>43</sup> However, when a buyer has agreed to discharge the encumbrance, he cannot claim to be reimbursed by the seller.<sup>44</sup> Under s 18(c) of the Specific Relief Act 1877, which corresponds to s 13 of the Act of 1963, the buyer has a right to compel the seller to discharge the encumbrance. The buyer is not bound to accept an indemnity from the seller.<sup>45</sup> But, if the seller has not paid off the encumbrance, the buyer may do so himself under s 55(5)(b), and set off the amount against the price. If the buyer is dispossessed by the encumbrancer, he may sue for damages on the implied covenant for title recognized in s 55(2), and in this sub-section.<sup>46</sup> If the encumbrance is a common charge on the property sold and other properties, the buyer may under s 56 insist on its being discharged out of the other properties. If the buyer sues for specific performance of the contract for sale, the court may direct the seller to discharge the encumbrance before he is paid the price.<sup>47</sup>

It is immaterial that the buyer was aware of the encumbrance when he contracted to buy.<sup>48</sup> In such a case, there is no duty of disclosure by the seller under s 55(1)(a) and, therefore, no fraud, but the statutory liability does not depend upon proof of fraud.<sup>49</sup> If the buyer pays the encumbrance, he has a right to be indemnified by the seller.<sup>50</sup> The existence of a covenant in the sale deed guaranteeing non-existence of an encumbrance would entitle the seller to indemnity.<sup>51</sup> This right of indemnity was denied in an Allahabad case<sup>52</sup> before the TP Act on the ground that there was no express provision in the contract of sale, and no such relation as is contemplated by ss 69 and 70 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. It is submitted that it should have been treated as an implied term of the contract, and that s 69 was applicable. In another case, the buyer was not allowed any damages when it was found that in defending a suit by the mortgagee he did not show sufficient diligence.<sup>53</sup>

The sale is not subject to encumbrances, unless there is an express provision to that effect.<sup>54</sup> If the sale is subject to encumbrances, the seller in addition to the price of his interest gets under s 55(5)(d) an implied indemnity against encumbrances affecting the property.<sup>55</sup> In a case where property was sold subject to an encumbrance which was stated to be of Rs 16,300, and the buyer had to pay Rs 23,000 to clear it, it was held that he was not entitled to recover the difference from the seller.<sup>56</sup> This was, however, merely a matter of the construction of the sale deed.

Proof of discharge of encumbrance

If the sale is not subject to encumbrances, the vendor does not make out a marketable title, unless he gives satisfactory evidence of the discharge of encumbrances. Thus, if he produces a release of a mortgage, he must show that the release is signed by a person duly authorized.<sup>57</sup>

(13) Rents

The seller of leasehold property is bound to pay rents accruing due upto to the date of sale.<sup>58</sup> In the same way, the buyer is required by s 55(5)(d) to pay rents accruing due after ownership has passed to him.

(14) Public Charges

Public charges would include government revenue,<sup>59</sup> municipal taxes, and payments charged upon land by statute either expressly or impliedly, by reason of their being recoverable by distress or other process against the land. If the buyer has to pay such charges owing to the seller's default, he would have the same right to indemnity as in the case of an encumbrance. The public authority imposing the charge will levy it on the party who is the owner for the time being, and is not concerned with the rights inter se of the buyer and seller.<sup>60</sup> The liability exists before the completion of the sale and continues thereafter, whether the existence of such charges or encumbrances is discovered before or after the completion. The obligation, unless there is a contract to the contrary, is absolute.<sup>61</sup>

(15) Duty to Enable Completion

It has been held by the Privy Council<sup>62</sup> that there is an implied covenant by the vendor to do all things necessary to effect a transfer, so where a vendor contracts to sell sirland, which can only be transferred after sanction by the revenue authorities, the vendor must apply for such sanction. This decision has been followed by the Supreme Court in Chandnee Widya Vati Madden v CL Katial,<sup>63</sup> and Nathulal v Phoolchand.<sup>64</sup> The Supreme Court in Rojasara

Ramjibhai Dahyabhai v Jani Narottamdas Lallubhai<sup>65</sup> has held that if the vendor agrees to sell the property which can be transferred only with the sanction of some government authority, the court has jurisdiction to order the vendor to apply to the authority within a specified period, and if the sanction is forthcoming to convey to the purchaser within a certain time. Following the said decision, the Delhi High Court has held that the seller cannot avoid the agreement on his own ipse dixit for non-performance of the terms on his part as agreed.<sup>66</sup>

(16) Section 55(2)--Covenant for Title

In a Calcutta case,<sup>67</sup> CJ Rankin observed that this clause contemplates a completed contract, and corresponds to the covenant for title in an English conveyance. The Madras High Court has said that this sub-section applies to cases where the transaction has not progressed beyond the stage of contract,<sup>68</sup> and the clause was referred to in a Lahore case while the transaction was still at the stage of contract,<sup>69</sup> but these cases, it is submitted, are incorrect.

Prior to completion and in the absence of any express stipulation in the contract, the buyer's right is to a title, free from reasonable doubt. Under s 17(b) of the Specific Relief Act 1963, a vendor cannot enforce specific performance, unless he can give the buyer a title free from reasonable doubt. In Babu Bindeshri v Mahant Jairam,<sup>70</sup> the buyer sued for specific performance of a contract for sale as the seller had refused to give him a guarantee of good title, but the Privy Council dismissed the suit as the plaintiff was not entitled to an absolute guarantee of title. However, the refusal of a vendor to give such a guarantee does not disentitle the buyer from claiming specific performance of the contract of sale.<sup>71</sup>

The expression 'title free from reasonable doubt' is analogous to the expression 'marketable title' adopted by courts of law while interpreting s 55(2). Bare expectancy of getting a right in course of time is not the same thing as asserting that the person asserting has an interest in the immovable property. 'Marketable title' is one in which the vendor would be in a position to force the property concerned on an unwilling purchaser under all circumstances. It should be shown to be free from doubts which a court of law would be disposed to accept as serious or sufficient.<sup>72</sup> Covenant under s 55(2) relates only to the title conveyed. If the title itself is restricted-eg subject to statutory charge-there cannot be a covenant of higher title. If the title is subjected to statutory charge under s 55(4), then the plaintiff who prevents defendant from cutting and removing the trees is not in breach of the covenant.<sup>73</sup>

The covenant implied by s 55(2) for quiet enjoyment relates only to the title conveyed. If the title itself is subject to restrictions, there cannot be a covenant for enjoyment of a higher title. The title conveyed may not in all cases entitle the vendee to possession. In such cases, it is wrong to state that the covenant for quiet enjoyment would take in a right to be in possession of the property conveyed. The title conveyed under the sale deed was subject to the statutory charge under s 55(4), and the seller was entitled to take all necessary steps to preserve his security. Therefore, it cannot be said that the plaintiff, in preventing the defendant from cutting and removing the trees by raising objections before the Collector and obtaining an order of temporary injunction, had violated the covenant for quiet enjoyment under s 55(2).<sup>74</sup>

The provisions of s 55(1) enable the buyer before completion to ascertain if the title offered is free from reasonable doubt. Once he has accepted the conveyance and the sale is completed, he has no remedy on the contract except for fraud. Thus, a dispute arising subsequent to the contract for sale of the property about a particular clause in the deed during the negotiations about the form the deed should take, cannot affect the completeness of the contract already made, nor can it amount to a repudiation when it is not persisted.<sup>75</sup> If the sale is vitiated by fraud, the buyer can sue to set aside the sale and to recover the price. Omission to make disclosure under s 55(1)(a) is fraud.

The implied covenant of title applies to any lawful eviction by the title paramount, and imports an absolute warranty of the title professed to be transferred, and of the seller's power to deal with it. It, therefore, supersedes the strict rule of English law by which the doctrine of caveat emptor applies after the buyer has accepted the conveyance.<sup>76</sup>

The covenant for title implied by s 55(2) gives the buyer a further remedy in cases of defects discovered after the conveyance.<sup>77</sup>

The implied covenant for title has nothing to do with the question whether the buyer has notice of the defect of the title; even if the buyer was aware of the defect at the time of the contract, he may, under this covenant, hold the seller responsible in damages,<sup>78</sup> and claim a return of the purchase money if he is dispossessed by reason of a defect in title.<sup>79</sup> However, the seller's liability is limited to the title which he has professed to transfer. If he describes himself as malik and does not mention that he has derived title from Hindu women, the interest which he professes to transfer is a full proprietary title. If he has only professed to transfer occupancy right,<sup>80</sup> he is not liable if the buyer is evicted by title paramount. However, if the vendor sells occupancy land as if he was absolutely entitled, he is liable in damages for breach of this covenant, irrespective of whether the buyer was aware of the defect.<sup>81</sup> So also if he sells non-transferable cantonment land as if he were absolutely entitled,<sup>82</sup> or if he sells as free from encumbrances, land which is subject to an encumbrance.<sup>83</sup> A mortgage debt is immovable property and if the mortgage debt is sold, and it then appears that the mortgage was invalid, the buyer is entitled to damages for breach of the implied covenant for title.<sup>84</sup> If an owner of property which is made non-transferable by statute agrees to transfer that property in a manner intended to circumvent the provision of the statute, the agreement is void in law and unenforceable, and damages cannot be awarded for breach of such an agreement. However, if a person purports to convey and agrees to guarantee quiet enjoyment to the vendee, the vendor or any person claiming under him cannot avoid paying damages for breach of the agreement.<sup>85</sup> Where a suit for the return of purchase money is based on the express covenant contained in the deed, s 55(2) has no application.<sup>86</sup> An agreement to sell by a mortgage does not extinguish the equity of redemption. In such a case, the vendor is not liable for damages, but only to the return of the purchase money.<sup>87</sup>

Two persons purchasing as co-tenants have separate interest with reference to the implied covenant for title, and may enforce it by separate suits.<sup>88</sup>

(17) Misdescription

Misdescription may be either of title, or of the property. Misdescription of title is a breach of the covenant for title, and gives a right to damages as explained in the last paragraph. However, the covenant for title does not extend to misdescription of property or corporeal misdescription, ie, as to the extent of the land sold.<sup>89</sup> In such a case, a suit will lie for rectification in a case of mutual mistake or fraud under s 31 of the Specific Relief Act 1877, corresponding to s 26 of the Act of 1963. But there may be a special covenant in the conveyance for compensation for errors.<sup>90</sup> In such a case, even a sub-purchaser may recover damages, for the benefit of the covenant runs with the land.<sup>91</sup>

Misdescription before completion

If the misdescription is discovered before the conveyance is executed the purchaser may rescind or claim damages if the misdescription is in a material and substantial point, so far affecting the subject-matter of the contract, that it may reasonably be supposed, that but for such misdescription, the purchaser would never have entered into the contract.<sup>92</sup> This is so even though there is a condition for compensation. However, if the misdescription does not materially alter the substance of the contract, the purchaser must complete and accept compensation.<sup>93</sup>

(18) Limitation

A suit for the return of purchase money may or may not be based on the implied covenant for title; if it is not, limitation is either under art 24 or art 47 of the Act of 1963, corresponding respectively to art 62 and art 97 of the Act of 1908. If it is, limitation is under art 55 of the Act of 1963, corresponding to art 116 of the Act of 1908. After the Limitation Act 1963 was enacted, the distinction is of little importance, as the period of limitation under art 55 is also three years.

In Hanuman v Hanuman,<sup>94</sup> the Privy Council held that a suit relating to a voidable sale deed was governed by art 97 (corresponding to art 47) as the sale went off on an objection taken by the coparceners of the vendors. It was observed, however, that if the sale was void ab initio, the appropriate article would be art 62 (corresponding to art 24). This was followed in Tulsiram v Murlidhar,<sup>95</sup> where the sale was voidable and art 97 was applied, and in Ardeshir v Vajesing,<sup>96</sup> where the sale was void and art 62 was applied.

The same rule applied to cases governed by TP Act. If the sale is voidable, limitation is under art 97 (corresponding to art 47 of the 1963 Act) from the date of dispossession,<sup>97</sup> or from the date when the imperfection of title is declared.<sup>98</sup> If the sale is void and possession is not given, art 24 (corresponding to art 62 of the Act of 1908) would no doubt be applied. However, the case where possession is given even though the sale is void, is not treated as a case of total failure of consideration ab initio, and art 97 corresponding to art 47 of the Act of 1963 is applied from the date of dispossession.<sup>99</sup>

If the suit for refund of the purchase money is on the implied covenant for title, art 116 corresponding to art 55 of the Act of 1963 applies. This is because the word 'compensation' in art 116 is not restricted to a claim for unliquidated damages and includes a claim for a certain and liquidated sum;<sup>1</sup> and a covenant in a registered deed is contract in writing registered within the article.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, if the sale is void as the seller has no title to convey and possession is not given, limitation is under art 116 from the date of the sale deed.<sup>3</sup> The distinction between the breach of registered contracts and other contracts has been abrogated in the Limitation Act 1963.

The covenant for title is a covenant that the vendor has a present title to convey, and is broken on the execution of a sale deed containing such a covenant.<sup>4</sup> It might, therefore, be supposed that if the vendee is put into possession and subsequently dispossessed owing to a defect of title, limitation under art 116 corresponding to art 55 of the Act of 1963 would still run from the date of the sale deed. But CJ Macleod in Multanmal v Budhumal,<sup>5</sup> pointed out that the discovery of the defect and dispossession might occur more than six years from the date of sale so that the terminus a quo for limitation should be the date of dispossession.

If there is an express covenant for quiet enjoyment or for indemnity in case of dispossession, limitation will be under art 116 corresponding to art 55 of the Act of 1963 from the date of disturbance.<sup>6</sup>

(19) Express Covenant for Title

Express covenants override and do away with the effect of all implied covenants.<sup>7</sup> However, although an express covenant is a special stipulation which alone governs the right of the parties, yet the implied covenant cannot be got rid of except by clear and unambiguous expressions;<sup>8</sup> so that the express covenant is over and above that implied by this sub-section.<sup>9</sup> For instance, in a case<sup>10</sup> where the covenant was:

you shall henceforward be enjoying the same hereditarily and with right of alienation by gift, sale or otherwise as you please.
Removing the hindrances to this arising from my agnates or king or neighbour, I shall see that the sale is given effect to in your favour without any obstruction -- it was held to be covenant for title as well as a covenant for quiet enjoyment. But although the recitals showed that title was derived from a widow, yet the implied covenant for title was not excluded because there was no clear and unambiguous expressions showing that the vendor did not mean to guarantee that he had a good title. The usual express covenant for title, is, like the above, one that includes a covenant for quiet enjoyment.<sup>11</sup>

An express stipulation to compensate the purchaser for any defect in title is not an express covenant for title, and does not exclude the implied covenant for title prescribed by s 55(2); the purchaser can, therefore, maintain a suit for the refund of a portion of the purchase money.<sup>12</sup>

A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not exclude the covenant for title, for a specific covenant will not exclude an implied covenant, unless it relates to the same subject matter. Thus, in the case of sale of his interest by a mortgagee with a covenant to make good any sums that had been paid by the mortgagor, this covenant was referred to the personal debt and did not exclude the implied covenant for title, and the mortgagee was liable in damages when the mortgage proved to be invalid.<sup>13</sup> In another case, the covenant in a sale deed was that 'if any dispute arises through me in respect of the land, I shall get it settled', the Madras High Court held that this was an express covenant for quiet enjoyment and that it did not exclude the implied covenant for title.<sup>14</sup> This is correct, for a covenant for quiet enjoyment is a future covenant. However, where in an Allahabad case<sup>15</sup> the covenant was:

if, God forbid, any person comes forward as partner or co-sharer and brings a claim, or if an encumbrance, etc is found... and the property passes out of the possession of the vendees we, the vendors shall.... pay to the vendees.... the consideration of this sale deed with costs.

It was held to exclude the implied covenant for title and when the vendees had to pay a sum exceeding the purchase-money to clear a prior mortgage, the court held that they had no remedy. But this decision was erroneous and was reversed by the Privy Council.<sup>16</sup>

Their Lordships observed:

With regard to the last portion of the sale deed, which states what is to ensue in the event of the vendees being put out of possession, it may, of course, be an additional safeguard, it may have been a thing suggested by the parties to cover contingencies which were not yet wholly foreseen, but that it contradicts or restricts the wider language of the contract of sale or that it either narrows or wipes out the obligation under the statute, cannot be maintained.

In other words, their Lordships held that it was a covenant for quiet enjoyment, which did not exclude the implied covenant for title. It has been held that eviction by a pre-emptor is due to the buyer being disqualified to purchase and is, therefore, not a breach of covenant for title.<sup>17</sup>

The correctness of this decision is very doubtful for the seller's covenant is 'that he has power to transfer', and this must mean transfer to the buyer. With reference to the covenant for quiet enjoyment, a general covenant to indemnify the purchaser against any loss that might accrue in connection with sale has been held to apply to eviction by a pre-emptor.<sup>18</sup> However, a covenant to refund the purchase money in case of dispossession does not apply to eviction by a pre-emptor, as the pre-emptor would have to pay the purchase money.<sup>19</sup>

A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not become a covenant for delivery of possession. There is no breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment in a case where no possession was delivered under the sale deed, and there is no subsequent dispossession.<sup>20</sup>

A recital in a sale deed to the effect that there was no encumbrance of whatever nature such as usufructuary mortgage implies that the purchaser would be reimbursed, if he suffers damage in consequence of any dispute.<sup>21</sup>

(20) Fiduciary Character

The implied covenant for title does not apply in the case of a trustee; or in the case of a guardian selling on behalf of a minor.<sup>22</sup> A trustee is only deemed to covenant that he has done no act whereby the property is encumbered or his power of transfer restricted. If a trustee conveys without disclosing his fiduciary character, he could no doubt be required to convey 'as beneficial owner' so as to become subject to the usual covenants for title. Section 38 of the Trust Act 1882, empowers trustees to sell on special conditions.

(21) Runs with the Land

The benefit of the implied covenant for title runs with the land.<sup>23</sup> It is, therefore, enforceable by subsequent purchasers of the land; and if the buyer re-sells to several purchasers, each one is entitled to sue on the covenant in respect of his part. In David v Sabin:<sup>24</sup>

A granted a lease to B, and B mortgaged to C. B then surrendered the term to A. A mortgaged to D, and then A and D conveyed to E. A had, however, not got in the interest left outstanding in C. C established his charge by suit against E. The Court of Appeal held that A was liable on the covenant for title to E and that as the covenant ran with the land it was no difference that B had mortgaged without the knowledge of A.

Restrictive covenant in a deed of conveyance running with the land, has been dealt with in several cases.<sup>25</sup> Covenants running with the land are further dealt with in the notes on ss 40, 108(c), and 108(j).

(22) Section 55(3)--Delivery of Title Deeds

The title deeds are things which pass with the conveyance without being named, as accessory to the estate.<sup>26</sup> This has been a principle of English law since the earliest times.<sup>27</sup> Accordingly, as in England, the seller has to deliver to the buyer all deeds relating to the property conveyed.<sup>28</sup> This includes documents in his power, but not in his possession and the cost of obtaining them must be borne by the seller.<sup>29</sup> Counterpart leases and kabuliyyets are deeds of title accessory to the estate;<sup>30</sup> and it has also been held that village account books should be delivered on the sale of a village, as they are necessary for the enjoyment and management of the estate.<sup>31</sup>

Prior to completion, the seller is bound under s 55(l)(b) to produce all title deeds in his possession and power, for inspection. However, the duty to deliver them does not depend upon completion. Even if the seller has executed the conveyance and put the buyer in possession, he need not deliver the deeds, until the price has been paid in full. This accords with the English law under which the seller's equitable lien gives him a right to retain the deeds of title until payment.<sup>32</sup> In Ma Hnit v Maung Po Pu,<sup>33</sup> the Privy Council observed that:

the duty of the purchaser ... was to tender a conveyance, and he would then, and not before such a tender was either made or waived, have the right to the deeds as the accompaniment of the transferred title.

However, in this case the price had already been paid.

The first exception to the rule is where the seller retains part of the property comprised in the deeds in which case he may retain the deeds, but is under an obligation for their safe custody and to produce and give true copies of them when required.

The second exception is when the property is sold in different lots. In that case the purchaser of the lot of the greatest value is entitled to the documents, but is under the same liability as to their safe custody and production, as stated in the preceding paragraph. This rule may be excluded by an express contract to the contrary, eg that the purchaser of 'the largest lot', ie, the lot of the greatest area, should have the deeds.<sup>34</sup> The sub-section does not explain what is to be done if the sales are at different times. In that case, the last purchaser would be entitled to the documents.<sup>35</sup>

(23) Section 55(4) (a)--Rents and Profits

As already explained, the contract for sale transfers no right in rem.<sup>36</sup> The seller is the owner subject to an obligation to fulfil the contract and accordingly, he has to take care of the property--s 55(l)(e); and to pay public charges and rents--s 55 (1) (g). This sub-section, therefore, declares his right to receive rents and profits which belong to him as owner, and which are the funds out of which he performs the duties of maintenance. The right to receive rents and profits remains with the owner despite an agreement to sell the property which passes no title on the prospective vendee.<sup>37</sup>

This sub-section shows that possession should be given by the seller when ownership passes to the buyer.<sup>38</sup> But if the buyer takes possession before completion, he would, as he takes the rents and profits, pay interest on unpaid purchase-money. This is because it is inequitable that the same person should enjoy both the rents and profits of the land as also the interest of the money.<sup>39</sup> It makes no difference that the land yields no profit, and that the delay in completion is due to the seller.<sup>40</sup> The rule in Fludyer v Cocker<sup>41</sup> that possession and interest are mutually exclusive was applied by the Judicial Committee in a case of compulsory acquisition, and the owner was allowed interest on price from the date on which he was dispossessed.<sup>42</sup> The committee said:

The Lordships are of opinion that the right to interest depends upon the following broad and clear considerations. Unless there is something in the contract of parties which necessarily imports otherwise, the date when one party enters into possession of the property of another is the proper date from which interest on the unpaid price should run. On the one hand, the new owner has possession, use, and fruits; on the other, the former owner parting with these, has interest on the price. This is sound in principle, and authority fully warrants it.

The Supreme Court has followed this principle.<sup>43</sup> It has been observed, however, that this rule is outside the provisions of the TP Act, and may be negatived by an express or implied condition to the contrary, or by evidence of conduct.<sup>44</sup>

The only exception to this rule is when after the buyer has taken possession, the seller delays completion and the circumstances are such as to require the purchaser to keep the purchase money lying idle and unproductive. In such a case the seller will not be entitled to interest.<sup>45</sup>

If the seller refused to execute a conveyance or to give possession, the buyer will be entitled to specific performance by execution of the conveyance, and compensation which would be mesne profits from the date when the conveyance should have been executed and possession given.<sup>46</sup> If the buyer takes possession before completion, the seller is entitled to interest on unpaid price from the day on which buyer actually takes possession although the buyer might safely have taken possession earlier.<sup>47</sup>

(24) Section 55(4) (b)--Seller's Charge for Unpaid Price

Clause (b) of sub-s (4) of s 55 provides that where the ownership of the property is transferred to the buyer before payment of the whole of the sale price, the vendor is entitled to a charge on that property for the amount of the sale price as also for interest thereon from the date of delivery of possession. Originally, there was no provision with regard to the date from which interest would be payable on the amount of unpaid purchase money. It was on the recommendation of the Special Committee that the words 'from the date on which possession has been delivered' were inserted into this clause by s 17 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 1929. This clause obviously applies to a situation where the ownership in the property has passed to the buyer before the whole of the purchase money was paid to the seller or the vendor. The statutory charge is inflexible.<sup>48</sup>

If the sale is completed by conveyance and the price or any part of the price is unpaid, the seller has under this sub-section a charge for the balance of price unpaid. This charge is the converse of the buyer's charge for price prepaid under s 55(6)(b). The mere execution of a promissory note by the vendee for the purchase money in favour of the vendor does not put an end to the vendor's charge for the unpaid purchase money, even if the vendor sues upon the note and obtains advance or even if he assigns the decree.<sup>49</sup> A sum of money kept with the vendee under a sale deed by the vendor, is a portion of the unpaid purchase money for which the vendor has a lien on the property sold.<sup>50</sup> Thus, in a case where an agreement was entered into and a sale deed was executed by which the vendee agreed to pay an additional amount if the property sold yielded a larger amount of the profit, it was held that the additional amount agreed to be paid, was a part of the purchase price and was a charge on the property.<sup>51</sup> Where a mortgagee having purchased the entire mortgaged property, an arrangement was arrived at between the mortgagee and the widow and infant son of the original mortgagor, pursuant to which the mortgagee reconveyed one village out of the mortgaged properties purchased by him and the widow being unable to pay the price down executed a mortgage in favour of the mortgagee-purchaser which mortgage, however, was found invalid for want of attention, the Privy Council held that the transaction constituted a sale and under s 55(4)(b), the mortgagee-purchaser who became the vendor was entitled to a charge on the village for the unpaid purchase price.<sup>52</sup>

Where, however, the title in the property has passed, but possession has not been delivered, the seller is not entitled to interest on the purchase price.<sup>53</sup> In an Andhra Pradesh case, a part of the sale consideration remained unpaid under the compromise decree for specific performance. Therefore, by the operation of s 55(4)(b), the seller had the first charge on the property that was passed on to the buyers. In the event of any breach of the express terms of the decree by any one of the parties, the other party could enforce it. Hence, a charge created by the operation of s 55(4)(b) for the unpaid purchase money in a decree for specific performance can be enforced by bringing the property to sale without a further suit under o 34, r 14 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908.<sup>54</sup>

To an oral sale, s 55(4)(b) does not apply, and the vendor has no charge on the unpaid part of the consideration.<sup>55</sup>

Punjab

The principle of s 55(4)(b) has been applied to Punjab as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>56</sup>

Non-possessory

The charge has been said to be a non-possessory lien,<sup>57</sup> ie, it is not a right to retain possession.<sup>58</sup> Accordingly, as the ownership has passed, the charge gives the seller no right to refuse possession.<sup>59</sup> The Madras High Court has held that if the vendee sues to recover possession after the execution of conveyance but before payment of price, the court has no power to put him on equitable terms as to the payment of price.<sup>60</sup> However, the Calcutta High Court, following a judgment of J Mahmud in an Allahabad case,<sup>61</sup> has held that such terms may be imposed as 'there is no reason why the right of the purchaser to obtain possession under s 55(l)(f), and the right of the vendor to realise the unpaid balance of the purchase money under s 55(4)(b) should not be recognized and enforced in one action'.<sup>62</sup> The Rangoon High Court has followed the High Court of Calcutta.<sup>63</sup> The Bombay High Court, while not making payment of the balance of the purchase money a condition of the purchaser obtaining possession, proceeds as if the vendor had counter-claimed. The purchaser's suit for possession is decreed, but in the decree a declaration of the vendor's charge is incorporated with a direction that the vendor should on payment of the court fee recover the amount by sale of the property.<sup>64</sup> The same view is taken by the Nagpur High Court.<sup>65</sup> The Allahabad High Court held that the provisions of s 55 did not exclude the application of the principles of equity; hence, where a purchaser who has not paid the full price, sues for possession, he can be put to terms by the decree.<sup>66</sup> If the seller is not in possession, he cannot of course rescind and reclaim possession because the buyer has not paid.<sup>67</sup> The seller's only remedy is to sue to enforce his charge, and he may also under s 55(3) refuse to part with the title deeds, if he has not already done so. Part of the purchase money left with the vendee, if unexpended, enures for the benefit of the vendee, and not of the vendor.<sup>68</sup>

Section 55(5)(b) is reciprocal with and complimentary to s 55(4)(b). Where the amount of the purchase price is left with the vendee for payment to an usufructuary mortgagee, it is not the money that is due to the vendor under s 55(5)(b) and, therefore, a statutory charge or a vendor's lien cannot be said to exist where an agreement between the parties is that the vendee should discharge the mortgage and recover possession.<sup>69</sup>

(25) Several Buyers

If there are several purchasers, the seller is not concerned with the proportion to be paid by each, but he has a charge on the whole property for unpaid purchase money.<sup>70</sup>

(26) Substitution of Equivalent Property

If the seller is unable to deliver possession of the property sold and the buyer accepts in substitution other equivalent property, the buyer remains liable for unpaid price.<sup>71</sup> The point did not arise in the case cited, but it is believed that the charge attaches to the substituted property.

(27) In the Hands of the Buyer

This expression has been made more intelligible by the addition of the words inserted by the Amending Act 20 of 1929. The phrase now is 'in the hands of the buyer, any transferee without consideration or any transferee without notice of the non-payment.' This construction seems to have been put upon the section by the Privy Council in Webb v Macpherson.<sup>72</sup> It was adopted by the courts in India,<sup>73</sup> and has now received the sanction of the legislature.

Illustration

A sold his house to B. There was a recital in the sale deed that the price had been paid. But the price had not been paid and 11 days after registration, B, as he could not raise the money, returned the deed to A with an endorsement rescinding the conveyance. The endorsement was not registered and did not affect B's title. The house was attached and sold by an execution creditor of B. The purchaser became the legal owner of the house but took subject to A's charge for unpaid purchase money. The purchaser could not claim to be a purchaser without notice as A was in possession at the date of the sale.<sup>74</sup>

In a case where the seller admitted receipt of consideration by a recital in the deed and also by a receipt endorsed on the deed, it was held that he was estopped from enforcing his charge against a transferee for value.<sup>75</sup> However, in another case it was said that recitals of receipt of consideration where none was paid was so common that there was no estoppel.<sup>76</sup> In such cases, it becomes a question of fact whether the transferee took with notice of the charge.

(28) Interest

After the words 'interest on such amount or part' the words 'from the date on which possession has been delivered' have been added by the amending Act 20 of 1929. This amendment adopts the decision of the Madras High Court in Muthia Chetty v Sinna Velliam<sup>77</sup> that the rights to interest depends upon the circumstances and equities of each case, and that interest on the unpaid purchase money will not be payable as long as the seller is in possession of the land. The purchaser is not liable if he retains part of the purchase money as security for the seller discharging an encumbrance.<sup>78</sup> However, if the purchaser retains part of the purchase money in order to pay off an encumbrance himself, and then fails to do so, he is liable for interest.<sup>79</sup>

(29) Enforcement

The charge is enforced under s 100 by a suit for sale as if the seller were a mortgagee. The charge cannot be enforced by a creditor,<sup>80</sup> or by a judgment creditor.<sup>81</sup> Being only a charge, it cannot be enforced against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the charge.<sup>82</sup>

(30) Limitation

Article 53 in the Limitation Act 1963, applies only to suits to recover the price from the defendant personally, while suits to enforce the charge against the property are governed by art 132 of the Act of 1908, which is now re-enacted as art 62 of the Act of 1963. This was so decided both before and after the amendment of the article.<sup>83</sup> If liability arises by virtue of a registered conveyance, limitation was governed by art 116 of the Act of 1908;<sup>84</sup> after 1 January 1964, however, there is no article corresponding to art 116, and art 53 or art 62 would apply. Time runs not from the date of the sale, but from the date when the plaintiff is damaged.<sup>85</sup>

(31) Recital of Payment

A false acknowledgement of receipt of price by a recital in a deed does not estop the seller from giving evidence as against the buyer that he has not received payment. The Privy Council in Shah Lal Chand v Indarjit<sup>86</sup> said that it was settled law, that notwithstanding an admission in a sale deed that the consideration has been received, it is open to the vendor to prove that no consideration has been actually paid. If it was not so, facilities would be afforded for the grossest frauds. However, such a recital may give rise to a presumption of payment.<sup>87</sup>

(32) Exclusion of Charge

Sale is a transfer for a price paid or promised or part paid or part promised. Therefore, where the consideration is price promised, the promise is itself the consideration, and there is no scope for a charge. So also, when the price is part paid and part promised, and the amount to be paid is fully paid. The distinction between a sale in consideration of covenant to pay a sum of money in the future and a sale in consideration of a sum of money which the buyer covenants to pay, may seem fine, but it is a very real distinction.<sup>88</sup> The former gives rise to a charge, the latter does not. If the sale is in consideration of a sum of money which the buyer covenants to pay, the charge may be excluded by an agreement express or implied which is inconsistent with its continuance.

In Webb v Macpherson,<sup>89</sup> the Privy Council said:

In their Lordships' opinion there is no ground whatever for saying that the charge is excluded by a mere personal contract to defer payment of a portion of the purchase money, or to take the purchase money by installments, nor is it in their Lordships' opinion, excluded by any contract, covenant, or agreement with respect to the purchase money which is not inconsistent with the continuance of the charge.

A direction to the buyer to pay the price to the creditor of the seller or to a third party does not exclude the charge.<sup>90</sup> If part of the purchase money is left with the buyer to pay off creditors of the seller, the seller is entitled to a charge for the amount left with the buyer, if the latter omits to pay the creditors.<sup>91</sup> Nor is the charge lost if the seller takes a security for the amount unpaid such as a memorandum of agreement,<sup>92</sup> or a bond,<sup>93</sup> or a mortgage,<sup>94</sup> or a promissory note.<sup>95</sup> However, if there is an agreement which puts the buyer under an enforceable liability to a third party as to the unpaid price, there is a contract to the contrary and the charge is lost. Thus, the seller has no charge if the buyer by his direction executes a promissory note to a third party, for the right to recover the unpaid price cannot reside in one party, and the right to enforce the security in another.<sup>96</sup> So also, if the direction to pay a third party is the result of a novation by which the seller's liability to the third party is extinguished, and the buyer becomes liable to the third party instead of the seller.<sup>97</sup> In cases where it was held that the promissory note or mortgage was not collateral security for the price, but the price itself, the charge was excluded.<sup>98</sup> Where the vendor leaves a part of the price with the vendee to be paid to his illegitimate son on attaining majority, the vendor is not entitled to have a lien on the property sold.<sup>99</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) A sells property to B on the 10 February 1905 for Rs 790. At the time of the conveyance, Rs 300 are paid and Rs 490 remain unpaid. For this amount B on the 13 February 1905 executes a registered bond promising to pay the amount in instalments of Rs 50 per mensem. B fails to pay and on the 10 February 1917. A sues to recover the unpaid price and to enforce his charge on the property sold. The remedy on the bond was time barred at the date of suit. But the bond was only a collateral security for the price. A had therefore a charge for the unpaid price. Limitation to enforce the charge was 12 years under art 132. The suit on the charge was in time and was decreed.<sup>1</sup>

- (2) A is a minor and his guardian on his behalf sells A's share of a house for Rs 2,886 to B. B pays half the price and as security for the unpaid balance executes a bond promising to pay A the sum of Rs 1,443 with interest at 6 per cent when he attained majority. A's charge for unpaid price is not lost.<sup>2</sup>
- (3) A sells property to B for Rs 28,000. Of this amount Rs 8,200 are paid on the date of the conveyance, Rs 19,800 are left with B to discharge a mortgage by A on the same and two other properties. B on the same date executes a security bond hypothecating his property as security for the payment of the mortgage, and covenanting to pay Rs 15,000 damages in case he defaults in making the payment by a fixed date. B dies not paying off the mortgage. A is entitled to a charge for Rs 19,800, being the unpaid price, but as to the Rs 15,000, he is entitled only to damages actually incurred.<sup>3</sup>
- (4) A sells property to B for Rs 2,000 of which Rs 1,000 is not paid. A owes Rs 1,000 to C. C agrees to release A from liability for the debt and to recover the amount from B who promises to pay C instead of A. The arrangement is a contract to the contrary and the charge is lost.

(33) Waiver

The charge as explained in the preceding paragraph is not waived on equitable considerations which would apply to the unpaid vendor's equitable lien in English law. It can only be waived by an express contract to the contrary or by an implied contract, ie, some conduct inconsistent with the continuance of the charge.

The case is overruled by the Madras High Court in Sivasubramania Ayyar v Subramania Ayyar<sup>4</sup> which proceeded on the ground of waiver, despite the warning given by the Privy Council in Webb v Macpherson<sup>5</sup> that a statutory charge cannot be waived on equitable grounds. In Punjab where the TP Act is not in force, the English rule was followed in a case where the seller agreed to accept shares in lieu of cash for the balance of the price.<sup>6</sup>

(34) Assignment

If the seller assigns the debt for the unpaid price, the assignee gets the benefit of the charge if the assignment is registered, but not otherwise.<sup>7</sup>

(35) Leases

The charge under this section cannot be extended to leases. There is no charge on the leasehold for unpaid premium even though the lease be in perpetuity.<sup>8</sup>

(36) Owelty of Partition

An owelty of partition is the difference paid in money in order to equalise shares in corporeal property which are incapable of a precise division, and in such a case, there is an implied lien or charge created on the land taken under partition for the payment of the owelty.<sup>9</sup> In a decision of the Kerala High Court,<sup>10</sup> the majority held that s 55(4)(b) applies to cases where the owelty is unpaid. It is respectfully submitted, however, that the majority view is erroneous, and the view of J Raghavan dissenting, that owelty is a part of the property being partitioned and cannot be equated to the purchase price, is correct.

(37) Section 55(5)(a) -- Buyer's Duty of Disclosure

The seller is by s 55(l)(a) under a duty to disclose latent defects. There is no doubt that the buyer is under no duty to disclose latent advantages, although he may not make a statement which is misleading. This is also the law in England as stated in the following passage from the judgment of Lord Selborne in Coaks v Boswell:<sup>11</sup>

Every such purchaser is bound to observe good faith in all that he says or does, with a view to the contract, and (of course) to abstain from all deceit, whether by suppression of truth or by suggestion of falsehood. But inasmuch as a purchaser is (generally speaking) under no antecedent obligation to communicate to his vendor facts which may influence his own conduct or judgment when bargaining for his own interest, no deceit can be implied from his mere silence as to such facts, unless he undertakes or professes to communicate them. This, however, he may be held to do, if he makes some other communication which, without the addition of those facts, would be necessarily or naturally and probably misleading.

Thus a buyer need not disclose the existence of a coal mine of which the seller is unaware.<sup>12</sup>

However, to this rule matters of title constitute an exception. Although the seller's title is ordinarily a matter exclusively within his knowledge, yet there may be cases where the buyer has information which the seller lacks. In such a case, he must not make an unfair use of it. He must give the information to the seller under the penalty of the contract being voidable for fraud both under s 17(5) of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and the last clause of this section. An English illustration is the case of Summers v Griffiths<sup>13</sup> where an old woman sold property at an undervalue believing that she could not make out a good title to it, while the purchaser knew that she could. The purchaser was held to have committed a suppressio veri and the sale was set aside as fraudulent. Another is Ellard v Landaff (Lord)<sup>14</sup> where a lessee obtained a renewal of a lease, in consideration of a surrender of the old lease, suppressing the fact that the person on whose life the old lease depended was on his death bed. This case has been adversely criticised,<sup>15</sup> but it would be good law under TP Act, and had been adopted in illust (a) to s 22 of the Specific Relief Act 1877. The corresponding section in the Specific Relief Act 1963 (s 20), does not however, contain that illustration.

There are no cases in India under the sub-section, but it has been described in Haji Essa v Dayabhai<sup>16</sup> as casting upon the buyer the duty of communicating facts about the seller's title.

(38) Section 55(5) (b)--Payment of Price

This sub-section is the corollary of s 55(l)(d), for the execution of the conveyance by the seller, and the payment of price by the buyer are reciprocal duties to be performed simultaneously. The buyer is bound to tender a conveyance for execution,<sup>17</sup> but the buyer is not bound to part with the price except on a complete conveyance to himself of the whole interest that he has purchased. This sub-section imposes a personal liability on the buyer, apart from the liability imposed by s 55(4)(b) on the property.<sup>18</sup>

Section 55(5)(b) does not require the buyer to deposit the purchase money in court when his tender is refused by the seller, and the tender does not become invalid for non-deposit in court.<sup>19</sup>

(39) Free from Encumbrances

It follows that if the property is sold free from encumbrances and they are not discharged at the time of conveyance, the buyer is not bound to pay. He may under s 13(l)(c) of the Specific Relief Act 1963, compel the vendor to discharge the encumbrance; or he may, under this sub-section, discharge it himself and set off the amount against the purchase money,<sup>20</sup> or recover it by a subsequent suit against the vendor.<sup>21</sup> If the amount due on the encumbrance is greater than the purchase money, he may retain the latter as security for the seller discharging it; and in such a case, he will not be liable for interest on the purchase money until after the seller has shown himself ready and willing to pay the difference and discharge the encumbrance.<sup>22</sup> If the seller has deposited a sum with the buyer for the discharge of the encumbrance and the sum proves to be greater than what is due, the excess belongs to the seller as part of his price.<sup>23</sup>

(40) Section 55(5) (c)--After Completion Buyer Bears Losses

After completion by conveyance, the ownership of the property having passed to the buyer, the buyer is the owner, and the property is at his risk. If the seller has committed waste, he is liable, but for all accidental destruction or deterioration after conveyance, the loss falls on the buyer.

It is clear both from this sub-section as well as sub-s (1)(e) that in the interval between the contract and conveyance, the seller bears the loss. Illustration (a) to s 13 of the Specific Relief Act 1877, would suggest the opposite. However, that illustration is based on English law, and could not be applied where TP Act is in force,<sup>25</sup> and has not been re-enacted in the Specific Relief Act 1963.

If the seller has insured the property against fire, the buyer may require the seller to apply the insurance money in restoring the premises.<sup>26</sup>

(41) Section 55(5) (d)--Outgoings After Completion

Under s 55(l)(g) the seller pays public charges and rents which have accrued due upto the date of the sale. After the sale, this liability is transferred to the buyer. The liability is a statutory and not a contractual liability and, therefore, it is binding on a minor vendor on whose behalf the property is sold.<sup>27</sup>

If the property is sold free from encumbrances, ie, if absolute ownership is to be conveyed, the seller must discharge the encumbrances. If a mortgagee brings to sale the mortgaged property free from encumbrances, the amount of municipal taxes accrued due before the sale must be deducted from the sale proceeds payable to him.<sup>28</sup> If the property is sold subject to encumbrances, the seller must pay interest on the encumbrances up to date of sale and after the completion, the buyer is liable to discharge the encumbrances. The rights and liabilities of the seller and buyer in a sale subject to encumbrances and in a sale free from encumbrances, were contrasted in a case with reference to the stamp duty.<sup>29</sup>

The liability enacted in this sub-section is between the seller and the buyer. If after a sale subject to encumbrances, the seller is made personally liable for an incumbrance, he has a right of indemnity against the buyer. If the encumbrance proves to be invalid, the seller has nothing to complain of, for his indemnity is complete. He cannot pick up the burden of which the land is relieved, and claim it as his. The seller cannot participate in any benefit the buyer may derive from his purchase after the conveyance.<sup>30</sup>

Illustration

A sells property to B for Rs 5,000. The sale is subject to a mortgage encumbrance which was believed to be of Rs 2,000. After the sale it is discovered that the mortgage is invalid; so that B has got complete ownership for Rs 5,000. A then sues to recover Rs 2,000 as part of his purchase money. A's suit fails for after conveyance. The seller cannot participate in any benefit derived by the buyer from his purchase.

It is pertinent to note that this illustration is the converse of the illustration in the note 'Free from encumbrances' under s 55(5)(b).

Public charges would be payable by the seller or by the buyer accordingly as they accrue before or after the sale.<sup>31</sup> The liability of the seller and the buyer inter se is no concern of the authority levying the charge.<sup>32</sup> If the charge is levied upon the seller after transfer of ownership, he has a right of indemnity against the buyer.<sup>33</sup>

Interest accrues due from day to day and would be apportioned accordingly; the seller paying interest upto the date of sale, and the buyer paying subsequent interest.

The buyer is bound to pay rents accruing due after the conveyance, just as the seller is under s 55(l)(g) bound to pay rents accruing due upto the date of sale. The sub-section assumes that the liability to pay rent is apportionable.

(42) Section 55 (6) (a)--Benefits After Completion

After completion, the transfer passes to the buyer all rights of ownership, and such rights as are under s 8 the legal incidents thereof. As to rents and profits, s 55(4)(a) gives these to the seller until completion, and this sub-section gives them to the buyer after completion. If any repairs are made by the seller to the property sold, the buyer is entitled to the benefit of such repairs, and the seller cannot claim any compensation for the same.<sup>34</sup>

(43) Section 55(6) (b)--Buyer's Charge for Price Prepaid

The Supreme Court, in Delhi Development Authority v Skipper Construction Co Pvt Ltd,<sup>35</sup> following Privy Council in Chettiar Firm v Chettiar,<sup>36</sup> has held that it is plain from s 55(6)(b) that in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the buyer will have a charge on the seller's interest in the property which is the subject matter of the sale agreement insofar as the purchase money and interest on such amount are concerned, unless the buyer has improperly declined to accept delivery. The charge is available against the seller and all persons claiming under him. This charge in favour of the buyer is the converse of the seller's charge under s 55(4)(b). The principle underlying this provision is a trite principle of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>37</sup>

This charge is statutory charge in favour of a buyer, and is different from a contractual charge to which the buyer may become entitled to under the terms of the contract. Consequently, the buyer is entitled to enforce the said charge against the property and for that purpose trace the property even in the hands of the third parties, and even when the property is converted into another form by proceeding against the substituted security, since none claiming under the seller including a third party purchaser can take advantage of any plea based even on want of notice of the charge. The said statutory charge gets attracted and gets attached to the property for the benefit of the buyer the moment he pays any part of the purchase money,<sup>38</sup> and is only lost in case of purchaser's own default or his improper refusal to accept delivery.<sup>39</sup>

The buyer has a charge for price prepaid, ie, for price that he has paid in anticipation of completion. Interest on price prepaid would run from the date of payment to the date of delivery of possession.<sup>40</sup> After the conveyance is executed and possession is given, this clause has no application.<sup>41</sup>

A charge would not be created if the parties expressly stipulate that the purchase money will not form the charge on the property, or it will be released from the charge on certain circumstances, or that earnest would be forfeited under certain circumstances.<sup>42</sup> If the seller has no personal interest in the property, there can be no charge under this sub-section. This was so held in a case where a mutawalli (who is a mere custodian) sold wakf property without the sanction of the court.<sup>43</sup> Where a guardian of a minor contracts to sell a property and such transfer is for legal necessity, the purchaser has a charge for the price paid on the minor's interest in the property.<sup>44</sup> No charge is available where the sale is not genuine.<sup>45</sup>

Where the agreement for sale is invalid or void, no charge would attach to the property;<sup>46</sup> this would be so, for instance, where a landlord agrees to sell land to a stranger, even though a tenant was in possession, contrary to s 64 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act 1948.<sup>47</sup>

There is a reference to the buyer's charge in an Oudh case,<sup>48</sup> which is difficult to understand. The shares of a father and sons were brought to sale in execution of a money decree and bought by A. Before the sale was confirmed, the property was mortgaged to B by a mortgage which was valid as to the father's share only. B paid off A, and the sale was set aside. Subsequently, the son's share was sold subject to B's mortgage, to C. B sued to enforce his mortgage, and it was held that B was entitled to recover the amount he had paid to A to set aside the sale. This is good law, for B's payment was not efficacious and he had paid the money for the preservation of his security. However, the judgment seems to proceed on the ground that B was subrogated to the charge of the purchaser A whose sale was set aside. It is difficult to understand how A's charge could continue after the sale had been set aside, and the price refunded to him. The judgment refers to s 55(4)(b), but that again seems to be a mistake for s 55(6)(b). The principle underlying s 55(6)(b) is a principle of justice, equity and good conscience, and applies to Punjab.<sup>49</sup> The buyer's charge, under the section is a statutory charge and differs from a contractual charge which a buyer may be entitled to claim under a separate contract.<sup>50</sup> A buyer can enforce his statutory charge against the property, and the plea of want of notice on the part of a third person would be of no avail.<sup>51</sup> A buyer's charge exists even in cases where the buyer is in possession of the property intended to be sold, and is not lost by his accepting the delivery of possession.<sup>52</sup> The creation of a charge under the section is not at all difficult when the buyer comes into possession of the property intended to be sold. It arises immediately when the purchase price is paid by the buyer to the seller.<sup>53</sup>

When the contract goes off by reason of the default of the seller and without the default of the buyer, the buyer does not lose the charge. The buyer can claim return of the purchase money under s 55(2) even if he was aware of the defect in the title of the same at the time of the contract. After the amendment of 1929, the charge can be enforced, according to the Madras High Court, even against persons claiming through the seller, irrespective of notice.<sup>54</sup>

(44) All Persons Claiming under him

The charge on the property is enforceable not only against the seller, but against all persons claiming under him. Before the amending Act of 1929, the words 'with notice of payment' occurred after the words 'all the persons claiming under him'. These words were omitted as they allowed a transferee without notice to escape. After the amendment of 1929, notice to the purchaser has become irrelevant.<sup>55</sup> Therefore, a transferee for consideration and without notice is also bound by the charge.<sup>56</sup> A gratuitous transferee, or a transferee for value with notice would in any event be liable under the second para of s 40.

Where the vendor has been declared an evictee, the purchaser can claim against the property, but cannot bring to sale the property sold by the competent authority to a third party.<sup>57</sup> It has been held by a single judge of the Bombay High Court<sup>58</sup> that a tenant purchasing his landlord's property under the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act 1948, is not a person claiming under the landlord, as the transaction is involuntary; it is doubtful if this is correct, though the actual decision can be supported on the ground that the agreement for sale was contrary to the provisions of that Act, and could not, therefore, create a charge at all.

(45) Improperly Declines to Accept Delivery

The buyer has a charge for all sums that he pays towards the purchase money, and for interest thereon. This charge attaches from the moment the buyer pays any part of the purchase money, and is only lost in case of his own subsequent default.<sup>59</sup> If the buyer improperly refuses to accept delivery, he loses his charge. The Supreme Court has held that when the property is compulsorily purchased by the Central Government under chapter XX-C of the Income Tax Act 1961, there is no occasion for the buyer to have improperly declined to accept delivery of the property. It was found on facts that the amount of purchase money was properly paid by the buyer, and was in anticipation of the fulfilment of the contract which would include delivery of the property. The order of compulsory purchase having intervened, the transferees were excluded from accepting delivery of property.<sup>60</sup>

However, although the buyer loses his charge the seller has no right to retain any instalments of price that have been paid, unless they have been paid as deposit or earnest. In a suit against the buyer, whether for specific performance or for damages, the seller would have to give credit for moneys prepaid not as earnest, but as instalments of price.<sup>61</sup>

In a Madras case, the intending buyer revoked his right to have the sale executed in his favour, only because the official assignee (in whom the property had in the meantime vested on the insolvency of the seller) insisted on bringing the property to sale in the interest of creditors, and the insolvency court so directed. It was held that the buyer can insist upon a charge on the property being created for the amount paid as purchase money and can secure a charge for the price pre-paid, that is to say, the price paid by him in anticipation of completion of a sale.<sup>62</sup>

(46) Earnest

The characteristic of earnest is that it serves two purposes. It goes in part payment of the purchase money for which it is deposited, but primarily it is security for the performance of the contract.<sup>63</sup> In Kunwar Chiranjit v Har Swamp<sup>64</sup> Lord Shaw said:

Earnest money is part of the purchase price when the transaction goes forward: it is forfeited when the transaction falls through, by reason of the fault or failure of the vendee.

This definition of earnest has been approved and adopted by the Supreme Court in Maula Bux v Union of India.<sup>65</sup> Supreme Court has also held that the charge created under s 55(6)(b) would extend to earnest money paid before the title passes.<sup>66</sup> Where the contract goes off by default of the buyer, the seller is entitled to retain the earnest money as forfeited.<sup>67</sup> However, if the seller is in default, the buyer refusing to complete is entitled to a refund of the earnest money.<sup>68</sup> The fact that after a judicial investigation, the title of the vendor is ultimately found to be clear does not disentitle the vendee to claim a refund of the earnest money.<sup>69</sup>

The provisions of s 55(6) relating to the purchaser's charge are subject to a contract to the contrary, but mere use of the word 'earnest' is not enough to constitute a contract to the contrary.<sup>70</sup>

It has been held, relying on the language of the clause, and on the decision in Ibrahimhai v Fletcher<sup>71</sup> that in such a case the purchaser is not entitled to any interest on the earnest amount till he files the suit.<sup>72</sup>

Where the buyer has accepted title and the seller has rescinded the contract and forfeited the deposit by reason of the buyer's failure to pay the balance of the price, the buyer cannot afterwards recover his deposit on discovering that the title is defective.<sup>73</sup> If the buyer's conduct does not amount to a repudiation, mere delay or such circumstances as would suffice to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance would not justify a forfeiture of the deposit.<sup>74</sup>

If it was intended to embody the terms of the contract in a written agreement, the mere payment of earnest money will not preclude the purchaser from pleading that there was no concluded contract.<sup>75</sup>

It is necessary, however, to distinguish between earnest and advance; there is no right to forfeit an advance.<sup>76</sup> Whether it is an advance or earnest, has to be ascertained from all the facts; a part-payment described as advance is earnest, and would be forfeited if it is paid as security for the performance of the contract, and the very fact, it has been said, that it is paid on the date of the agreement raises a presumption that it was paid as a security.<sup>77</sup>

Again, the right to forfeit earnest does not apply to a quantum of earnest agreed to, but not in fact paid by the buyer; the seller cannot claim to recover such amount.<sup>78</sup>

(47) Interest

So far as payment of interest is concerned, the section specifically envisages payment of interest upon the purchase-money/price prepaid, though not so specifically on the earnest money deposit, apparently for the reason that an amount paid as earnet money simplicitor, as mere security for due performance does not become repayable till the contract or agreement got terminated and it is shown that the purchaser has not failed to carry out his part of the contract, and the termination was brought about not due to his fault, the claim of the purchaser for refund of earnest money deposit will not arise for being asserted.<sup>79</sup>

(48) Properly Declines to Accept Delivery

This may occur when the sale goes off by default of the seller, or without default of either party.

If the seller is in default, he is not entitled to forfeit the earnest.<sup>80</sup> When the buyer by reason of such default properly declines to take delivery, his charge extends not only to prepaid price including earnest and interest thereon, but also to the costs of the suit for specific performance or for rescission. There is a similar provision in s 13(1)(d) of the Specific Relief Act 1963. Expenses incurred in pursuance of the contract have also been allowed.<sup>81</sup> An instance of a sale not being concluded owing to the default of the seller is Rose v Watson.<sup>82</sup> The buyer agreed to buy a part of a large plot, on the seller representing that it would be laid out in buildings. The seller failed to carry out his representation and the buyer rescinded the contract owing to the seller's default. Lord Westbury said--

The purchaser would have been willing to perform the contract if the vendor had performed those things which, in good faith, he was bound to do.

and held that the purchaser's charge was not lost.

Other instances of a seller being in default are when a seller is unable to make out a good title;<sup>83</sup> or when a seller fails to obtain the renewal of certain leases in time, such renewal within the stipulated time, being one of the conditions of the contract of sale.<sup>84</sup> Similarly, where a sale was subject to the vendor obtaining planning permission, he must do so within a reasonable time even if no time is specified, and if he fails to do so, the purchaser may properly decline to complete the transaction.<sup>85</sup>

- (1) A agrees to sell property to B, and undertakes that a part owner C will join in the conveyance. But in breach of the agreements A and C convey the property to D. B sues for specific performance and D offers to convey A's half share if B will pay the full price. B refuses this offer, as he was entitled to do under s 15 of the Specific Relief Act 1877(now s 12(3) of the Specific Relief Act 1963). B has properly declined to accept delivery and has a charge for part of the price that he had prepaid.<sup>86</sup>
- (2) A agrees to sell a house to B and puts B in possession. A sale deed is executed, but is not registered. B sues for specific performance but his suit is dismissed. A sues to evict B. Property has not passed under the unregistered deed, and the case being before the enactment of s 53A, the agreement is no defence to the ejectment. B is only entitled to a charge for price prepaid.<sup>87</sup>

Section 55(6)(b) applies only where it is possible for the vendor to give delivery, and yet he fails to do so. Where the contract depends for its performance upon the vendor recovering possession from the tenant who is protected under tenancy law and the purchaser is aware of the contingency, the statutory lien under s 55(6)(b) is not created until the vendor secures possession from the tenant, and is himself in a position to give delivery.<sup>88</sup>

If, without default of either party, the sale is not completed, the buyer does not lose his charge. An instance of such a case is Whitbread & Co Ltd v Watt.<sup>89</sup> In that case, the agreement was to purchase as soon as three hundred houses were built on the estate. The purchaser rescinded after three years, as the houses had not been built. The court held that the charge of the vendee remained operative, although there had been no default on the part of the vendor.

(49) Sub-purchaser

In case the buyer before completion re-sells to a sub-purchaser, the latter has in English law a charge on the buyer's equitable interest.<sup>90</sup> This statement of the law is accepted by Shephard and Brown as being applicable in India. However, the judgment of Lord Cairns in the case cited proceeds on the ground that the buyer who has by virtue of his contract an equitable estate becomes, on part payment, owner of the property to the extent of his payment. This line of reasoning has no application under the TP Act where no right in rem passes under the contract. When the case arises, it will probably be held that the sub-purchase operated as an assignment pro tanto of the buyer's charge.

(50) Enforcement

The charge is enforced by suit for sale. It is enforceable against all persons claiming under the seller, irrespective of whether they have notice of the payment.

(51) Non-disclosure Fraudulent

The last paragraph of the section enacts that the omission of disclosure, whether by the seller under s 55(1)(a) or by the buyer under s 55(5)(a), is fraudulent. In the absence of this provision such non-disclosure would be a misrepresentation under s 18(2) of the Indian Contract Act 1872, and render the contract voidable. It is well settled that where a purchaser discovers defects in the property before conveyance, he can either rescind the contract, or successfully resist a suit for specific performance.<sup>91</sup> However, the effect of this provision is that the party who suffers by the non-disclosure has the right not only to rescind the contract, but to set aside the conveyance. This is necessary as the non-disclosure may only be discovered after the conveyance.

(52) Remedies After Completion

Remedies after completion are much more limited than those before completion because most contractual rights merge in the conveyance. In a judgment of the Madras High Court,<sup>92</sup> Justice Venkatarama Ayyar (as he then was) has reviewed both English,<sup>93</sup> and Indian<sup>94</sup> authorities, and stated the position thus:

If the contract has been completed by the execution of the sale deed, then the purchaser can claim compensation if he establishes fraud; or if there is a special agreement for making compensation for errors in quantity or if there is a warranty that the extent conveyed by the sale deed is correct. Apart from such cases he has no right to compensation.

Compensation can be claimed in cases of fraud,<sup>95</sup> or if there is an express contract to that effect in the agreement for sale,<sup>96</sup> or if the court finds on a true construction that such a warranty was necessarily implied in the agreement;<sup>97</sup> such a warranty cannot, however, be established by oral evidence.<sup>98</sup> There can, of course, be no fraud if the purchaser had actual or constructive notice of the defect.<sup>99</sup>

It is, however, open to a purchaser to renounce his position as such, and to fall back upon his previous relationship with the seller.<sup>1</sup>

Remedies after completion are (1) Rescission; or (2) Rectification.

Rescission

Rescission may be on the ground either (a) of fraud; or (b) common mistake; or (c) incapacity, legal or equitable; or (d) coercion or undue influence.

The first two grounds, fraud and common mistake, follow the common law rule that except on these grounds, an executed conveyance cannot be rescinded after it has been substantially performed.<sup>2</sup> Non-disclosure infringing s 55(l)(a) or s 55(5) (a) is declared to be fraud and would, therefore, give a right to set aside the conveyance, and to a refund of the purchase money. A Bombay case<sup>3</sup> is an instance of a deed set aside for fraud, while Bingham v Bingham<sup>4</sup> is an instance of a common mistake where the buyer purchased land which both parties thought belonged to the seller, but which really belonged to the buyer himself.

A seller is under a legal incapacity to sell if he is a minor or a lunatic, and a suit would lie to set aside the sale. A fiduciary relationship between the parties may also render the contract voidable after completion.<sup>5</sup>

Rectification

When the sale deed either on account of fraud or of common mistake does not truly express the intention of the parties, the court will rectify it in conformity with the contract.<sup>6</sup>

(53) Enforcement of Obligation not Merged in the Conveyance

The buyer may under s 55(l)(f) sue to recover possession;<sup>7</sup> or under s 55(3) for the delivery of title deeds;<sup>8</sup> or under s 55(2) for compensation for breach of the covenant for title;<sup>9</sup> or under s 55(l)(e) for compensation for breach of the duty to take care of the property;<sup>10</sup> or under s 55(l)(g) for an indemnity against encumbrances discharged in case of sale of land free from encumbrances,<sup>11</sup> or under s 55(6)(b) to enforce his charge for the price prepaid.<sup>12</sup>

On the other hand, the seller may sue under s 55(4)(b) to enforce his lien for unpaid purchase money;<sup>13</sup> or for an indemnity against encumbrances in case of a sale of land subject to encumbrances.<sup>14</sup>

There would also be a right of suit for compensation for breach of express covenants such as for quiet enjoyment;<sup>15</sup> or to give vacant possession;<sup>16</sup> or for compensation for errors of description where the contract provides for such compensation;<sup>17</sup> or for breach of collateral warranty.<sup>18</sup>

(54) Remedies Before Completion

Remedies before completion depend upon the law of contract, and of specific performance. The contract may be rescinded not only for fraud, common mistake<sup>19</sup> or the disability of the party, but also for misrepresentation when there is no intention to deceive or to state a falsehood.<sup>20</sup> The right to repudiate a contract for defect of title must be exercised immediately when the defect is discovered. If after ascertaining the defect, the purchaser treats the contract as subsisting, he does not retain the right to repudiate at any subsequent moment he chooses, but must give the vendor a reasonable time to remedy the defect.<sup>21</sup> No question of giving time arises, of course, when the vendor has refused to remove the defect.<sup>22</sup> On the breach of any essential terms of the contract, the other party may rescind and sue for damages,<sup>23</sup> and in that case, must restore any benefit that he has received.<sup>24</sup> If the buyer has gone into possession, he is accountable for the rents and profits that he has received. If the seller has received the price, he must return it. If the seller rightfully rescinds, he is entitled to forfeit the deposit or earnest. He is under no obligation to return the deposit because it is not a benefit he has received under the contract, but a collateral security.<sup>25</sup> However, if he recovers damages as well, he must give credit for the deposit against the damages.<sup>26</sup>

If the aggrieved party does not elect to rescind, he may still sue for damages for the breach. The best remedy is, however, a suit for specific performance of the contract. A vendor in such a suit may compel the purchaser to take the property in spite of trivial defects, and to receive compensation for the deficiency.<sup>27</sup> This relief is discretionary and the court has regard not only to the legal rights of the parties, but to the conduct and the circumstances of the case. Specific performance will be refused under s 20 of the Specific Relief Act 1963, on the ground of unfair advantage or of hardship.

(55) Damages

Damages are claimable under the law as enacted in s 73 of the Indian Contract Act 1872. This would be the difference in the market value at the time of the contract, and at the time of the breach. The rule is the same as in English law, except where the default of the vendor is due to a defect in his title. In this case, damages are limited to the expenses the buyer has incurred.<sup>28</sup> This exception does not apply where the default of the seller is wilful;<sup>29</sup> and it has no application to a breach of covenant for title in a conveyance.<sup>30</sup> The English law was once assumed to be the law in India,<sup>31</sup> but it is now settled that the law in India is different, and that there is the same measure of damages in the case of goods as in the case of land, and that both are governed by s 73 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.<sup>32</sup> For a further exposition of the law on this subject, the reader is referred to Pollock and Mulla's Indian Contract Act. Damages for eviction in breach of an express covenant for quiet enjoyment is the value of the land calculated at the date of the breach,<sup>33</sup> and if the land has increased in value, the purchaser will be entitled to recover the higher value.<sup>34</sup>

(56) In the Absence of a Contract to the Contrary

The implied conditions enumerated in this section are supplemented or varied in actual practice by numerous particular conditions. Such conditions are strictly construed in favour of the party whose rights are restricted. In Seaton v Mapp,<sup>35</sup> Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce stated the principle of construction as follows:

I think, and have always thought that when a vendor sells property under stipulations which are against common right, and place the purchaser in a position less advantageous than that in which he otherwise would be, it is incumbent on the vendor to express himself with reasonable clearness; if he uses expressions reasonably capable of misconstruction, if he uses ambiguous words, the purchaser may generally construe them in the manner most advantageous to himself.

This rule applies especially to conditions restricting investigation of title.

It has been observed by the Andhra High Court that a contract to the contrary must be strictly construed because such a contract is in restraint of legal rights.<sup>36</sup> It is submitted that this is not correct, for s 55 merely lays down general rules, and in terms contemplates a departure from those rules in particular cases. Where the contract to the contrary departs from the usual terms and puts either the vendor or the purchaser in an unfairly advantageous position, the court can, of course, construe any ambiguity or vagueness in such a contract against the party in such a position. The general principles contained in s 55 regarding rights and liabilities of the buyer and seller can only apply in the absence of a contract to the contrary, and not in a case where the parties consciously negotiated, but failed in respect of any terms or conditions--as a result of which the agreement itself could not be settled or concluded.<sup>37</sup>

Conveyancing in India is in a rudimentary condition. Even in the Presidency-towns like Bombay and Calcutta (where the conveyancing practice which obtained in England at Common law is generally followed), an abstract of title is very rarely delivered. The seller's solicitor sends the buyer's solicitor, a bundle of deeds on his requisitions. However, the investigation of title is a difficult mailer. There is no standard period for the root of title. Title deeds are more often lost in India. This is because the seller does not keep them in safe custody with his solicitor or banker. Again, the prevalence of benami transactions, the joint and undivided Hindu family system, and the tenancy in common of Mahomedan heirs, are all matters which complicate the investigation of title. It is, therefore, not unusual to supplement the sale deed by a declaration that uninterrupted possession has been held for upwards of 12 years, or that the property is self-acquired. Further, publicity is given to the transaction by the beating of a battaki, or by advertisement in a local newspaper giving notice of the contract of sale and inviting claims, if any.

The particular conditions restricting investigation of title which are common in England are, therefore, rare in India. However, solicitors especially in Presidency-towns in India follow English conveyancing precedents, and it is, therefore useful to enumerate not only the particular conditions which occur in Indian contract for sale, but also those which have been the subject of judicial construction in England.

(1) Restricting requisitions--

The conditions in contracts for sale frequently impose restrictions on the buyer's right to make requisitions as to title. These generally fall into the following classes:

- (a) Requiring requisitions to be made in a specified time.
- (b) Restricting the period for which title is to be shown.
- (c) Requiring the existence of a fact to be assumed.
- (d) Requiring the buyer to accept title as it is.

- (a) Requiring requisitions to be made in a specified time.--Conditions of sale may stipulate that requisitions shall be made in a specified time of the delivery of the abstract of title or otherwise, the buyer shall be deemed to have accepted title. This is construed as meaning a time from the delivery of a perfect abstract, ie, an abstract as perfect as the seller can make it,<sup>38</sup> and an abstract which shows all the documents, and gives all the facts upon which the vendor's title is based.<sup>39</sup> If the contract provides that time is to be of the essence of the contract, it operates as a waiver if a requisition is not made in time. However, the condition does not apply if the seller has no title at all,<sup>40</sup> and it cannot be used to thrust upon a purchaser, a property to which there is no title.<sup>41</sup>
- (b) Restricting the period.--There is no statutory period in India. Apart from the statutory limit, the period for which title has to be shown may be fixed by the contract. The condition may require that a particular deed be taken as the root of title, and in that case requisitions cannot be made with regard to a time before that deed.

However, both with reference to the statutory period (in England) and the period (if any) fixed by contract, it is well settled that such limitation does not affect the main rule that the seller should show a good title, but only the subordinate rule that title for the period fixed by contract or by statute shall be prima facie evidence of a good title; in other words, the purchaser may object that the title shown for the period is defective.

A condition restricting the period of investigation does not prevent the buyer from making inquiries aliunde, and if he discovers a defect, he is entitled to call for evidence to cure the defect;<sup>42</sup> so also, if the seller allows inspection of a prior title deed which enables the buyer to discover the defect.<sup>43</sup>

On the other hand, the seller may by appropriate stipulation exclude even independent investigation of title. The leading case on this point is Hume v Bentley ,<sup>44</sup> where lease-holds were sold on condition that 'the lessor's title will not be shown, and shall not be inquired into.' The buyer discovered facts, which he contended showed that the lessor, a canal company, had under its incorporating statute no power to grant the lease, but his objection was disallowed. A similar case is National Provincial Bank of England and Marsh IN RE ,<sup>45</sup> where the condition was that the root of title should be a conveyance of 1869, and that 'the prior title shall not be required, investigated or objected to.' The buyer discovered aliunde facts which showed that it was doubtful whether a former grantor had a fee simple or merely a life estate, but he was not allowed to rescind. In such cases, the buyer cannot rescind as there has been no fraud or misrepresentation by the seller, but the seller would probably not be able to enforce specific performance if the title were shown to be bad, as the court would exercise in favour of the buyer the discretion that it has under s 20 of the Specific Relief Act 1963. Specific performance was enforced in Hume v Bentley<sup>46</sup> as the court refused to decide the question whether the lease was valid, and the buyer apparently got what is called a good holding title, ie, a title not likely to be challenged; but in National Provincial Bank of England and Marsh IN RE.<sup>47</sup> J North, said that he was not deciding that the purchaser was bound to accept the vendor's title, if it should turn out to be a bad one.

- (c) Requiring the existence of a fact to be assumed.--Such a condition will be enforced if the seller himself believes the statement of fact to be correct.<sup>48</sup> However, if the seller knows it to be false, the condition gives the seller an unfair advantage over the buyer, and the contract will not be enforced in a suit for specific performance. Thus, in Banister IN RE., Broad v Munton,<sup>49</sup> the condition stated that it was not accurately known how a predecessor in title acquired the property, and required the buyer to assume that he was seized in fee-simple, free from encumbrances. The seller, who was a solicitor, knew accurately how the predecessor had acquired the property, and that she was not seized in fee-simple. MR Jessel said that the utmost that can be asked of a purchaser is that he shall assume something of which the seller knows nothing, and refused specific performance.
- (d) Requiring the buyer to accept title as it is.-If the seller stipulates that the buyer shall accept the title as it is, the buyer has notice that the title is questionable and if he chooses to buy, he will be held to his bargain.<sup>50</sup> However, this condition does not relieve the seller of the obligation under s 55(l)(a) of disclosure,<sup>51</sup> or of giving as good a title as he can, ie, by paying off a mortgage.<sup>52</sup> Nor will the condition be enforceable if he has no title at all,<sup>53</sup> and a fortiori if he knows that he has no title.<sup>54</sup>

Illustration

A, a mortgagee, acting under a power of sale, agreed to sell the property mortgaged and B agreed to purchase it. B then discovered that A had no title because his mortgagor had stolen the title deeds and the real owner was in possession. The sale contained a condition that 'the purchaser shall take the premises sold with such title only as the vendor can give him.' A was nevertheless not entitled to require B to complete his purchase; for the condition necessarily implied that A had some title, however defective it might be.<sup>55</sup>

When a mortgagee assigned the debt and his interest with a condition that he was not liable for any defect in the claim transferred, and the mortgage proved to be invalid as it was attested by only one witness, the assignment was nevertheless held to be valid because it included a personal claim.<sup>56</sup>

(2) Title to the satisfaction of the buyer's solicitors--

The contract sometimes provides that the seller should show a title satisfactory to the buyer's solicitors. The seller must then show either that the solicitor did approve of the title, or that there was such a title tendered as made it unreasonable not to approve of it.<sup>57</sup> The reasonable meaning of this condition is not to make the possibly arbitrary opinion of a certain or uncertain solicitor final, but to claim the purchaser's right of investigating title with professional assistance, and of refusing to complete if the title proved to be bad.<sup>58</sup> This is a usual condition in contracts of sale in Bombay.

(3) Deposit--

The seller invariably insists on a provision for the payment of a deposit. This is advantageous to him as the deposit is not only part payment, but security for performance, and may be forfeited if the sale goes off owing to the buyer's default.<sup>59</sup> However, the buyer should pay it to the seller's solicitor as stake-holder, for if he pays it to the solicitor as the agent of the seller, and the seller becomes insolvent, he will be unable to recover it from the solicitor.<sup>60</sup> There is sometimes an express provision for forfeiture of deposit on the buyer's default, with liberty to the seller to resell, and recover the deficiency and the costs of re-sale from the original buyer.

(4) Vendor's right of rescission--

This provision is that, on the buyer making, or the buyer insisting upon any requisition with which the seller is unwilling or unable to comply, the seller may rescind the contract returning the deposit without interest, and without costs of investigating the title. This right must be exercised reasonably and in good faith;<sup>61</sup> the vendor will not be allowed to rescind where he has been guilty of a shortcoming which, though falling short of fraud or dishonesty, might be described as recklessness.<sup>62</sup> Thus, a vendor who had agreed to sell land subject to a mortgage free of encumbrances, was held not entitled to rescind under such a condition as he had made no proper inquiries with the mortgagees as to whether they would concur in the sale.<sup>63</sup> However, though a vendor has to be reasonable, he does not have to be beyond criticism before he can exercise his right of rescission; where a vendor had failed to warn the purchaser of certain evidential gaps in his title, but had made a serious attempt to meet the requisitions, he was held entitled to rescind.<sup>64</sup> The seller cannot, of course, exercise the right if he has been guilty of misrepresentation,<sup>65</sup> or if he has no title,<sup>66</sup> nor does such a clause empower the seller to override reasonable requisitions.<sup>67</sup>

A vendor may rescind where the purchaser insists on an objection as to an undisclosed right of way.<sup>68</sup>

(5) Purchaser's right of rescission--

It is also a common condition that the buyer may rescind if any notice affecting the property is received from the municipality, or if the property or any part of it is notified for acquisition under the Land Acquisition Act.

(6) Identity of the property--

It is usually stipulated that no other evidence of the identity of the property should be required than that afforded by a comparison of the description in the contract with that in the documents. However, this condition is not effective if such comparison affords no evidence of identity,<sup>69</sup> or if the description in the document is discrepant.<sup>70</sup>

In the event of ambiguity, a plan attached to the conveyance can be looked as to ascertain the identity of the property even if such a plan is not referred to in the conveyance.<sup>71</sup>

(7) Compensation for errors of description--

It is usually provided that errors of description will not annul the sale, and either that compensation should be allowed, or that compensation should not be allowed, if the condition is that compensation should not be allowed it will probably exclude the purchaser's right to enforce specific performance with compensation. However, such a condition will not enable a seller to force upon a buyer a substantially different property.<sup>72</sup>

If the condition allows compensation, English cases<sup>73</sup> apply the rule in Flight v Booth,<sup>74</sup> that the condition will cover even a considerable discrepancy if the property is substantially the same. This would probably be followed in India, for the terms of the condition would be regarded rather than the somewhat restrictive provision of s 12(2) of the Specific Relief Act 1963. Under this condition, compensation may be claimed even after completion.<sup>75</sup> However, a warranty against encumbrances does not entitle the seller to compensation for a discrepancy in the area.<sup>76</sup>

Whether the condition includes or excludes compensation, it applies of course only to innocent errors, and not to cases of intentional misrepresentation.<sup>77</sup>

If the condition applies to any error, mis-statement or omission discovered in the particulars of sale, it refers to matters of title, as well as the subject matter of the contract.<sup>78</sup> If it refers to the description of the property, it does not extend to defects of title.<sup>79</sup>

(8) Time for completion--

A time for completion is usually fixed, but where no time is fixed, the Privy Council have adopted the English rule that time is not of the essence of the contract, unless it can be so inferred from the circumstances of the case.<sup>80</sup> If there has been an unreasonable delay, either party can make time of the essence by giving a notice to complete in a reasonable time;<sup>81</sup> but the time fixed must be reasonable.<sup>82</sup> What is reasonable time has to be ascertained after considering all the circumstances including the ability of the purchaser to find the money, and not merely conveyancing difficulties; a period of 28 days is not reasonable where the vendor knows of the purchaser's difficulties of finding the money because a proposed sub-sale had fallen through.<sup>83</sup> Where, however, time has been fixed, and made the essence, reasonableness of the notice to complete is immaterial.<sup>84</sup> The stipulation as to time for making requisitions, referred to in condition (1) above, is a useful means of expediting completion.

(9) Interest on unpaid price--

It is usual to provide that the buyer shall pay interest from the date fixed for completion on the balance of the price. This may be either absolute, or conditional on non-completion due to wilful default of the purchaser, or any cause other than wilful default of the seller.

If it is absolute, ie, where the delay occurs 'for any cause whatever,' these words will not allow a vendor to take advantage of his own wrong.<sup>85</sup> However, if the seller has not been guilty of misconduct, lapse of time occasioned by a defect in the seller's title not known to him at the time of the contract, and which he has taken steps to remove will not relieve the purchaser of his liability for interest under the condition.<sup>86</sup>

Illustration

A contracted to sell half an estate to B, the purchase to be completed on 24 June 1854, and if 'for any cause whatever' the purchaser should not be completed on that day, B was to pay interest. The other part owner claimed the whole estate and refused to part with the deeds. Asued for partition and a decree was made in July 1862. B had not elected to rescind and in spite of the delay of eight years he was liable to pay interest because there had been no misconduct by A.<sup>87</sup>

(10) Wilful default--

What is wilful default is a question of fact. Wilful default implies that the default is intentional,<sup>88</sup> ie, the party knows that what he is doing or omitting is something which it was wrong for him to do or omit.<sup>89</sup> Wilful default implies that the party was a free agent, and that what he has done arises from the spontaneous operation of his will; while default means nothing more and nothing less than not doing what is reasonable in the circumstances.<sup>90</sup>

If both parties are in the wrong, it is not a case of cause other than wilful default of the seller so as to exempt the purchaser from liability for interest.<sup>91</sup>

(11) Cost of conveyance--

The conditions of sale generally throw the cost of conveyance as much as possible on the buyer. However, a condition that each party should pay half and half including the stamp and registration charges is not usual in India. The seller is liable for the cost not only of perusing and executing the draft tendered by the buyer, but also of execution by any other necessary party and of getting in an outstanding legal estate and completing the title; but the latter expenses are sometimes thrown on the buyer.<sup>92</sup> In an open contract, the seller must bear the expense of procuring and making an abstract of any deed forming part of the title, although such deed be not in his possession.<sup>93</sup>

(12) Property sold free from encumbrance--

The direction given in the sale deed that the amount retained by the vendee was to be paid to a simple money creditor and a covenant on the part of the vendor to pay off an outstanding mortgage and giving liberty to the vendee to pay the same in case the vendor failed to pay, was not a contract to the contrary and the vendee was not precluded from retaining the sum reserved for payment to the simple creditor.<sup>94</sup>

(13) Insurance-

The condition as to insurance provides that on payment of a proportionate part of the premium, and subject to the consent of the insurance office, the benefit of the policy shall be assigned to the buyer from the date of completion.

Marshalling by subsequent purchaser

--If the owner of two or more properties mortgages them to one person and then sells one or more of the properties to another person, the buyer is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to have the mortgage-debt satisfied out of the property or properties not sold to him, so far as the same will extend, but not so as to prejudice the rights of the mortgagee or persons claiming under him or of any other person who has for consideration acquired an interest in any of the properties.

(1) Amendment

This section has been substituted by the amending Act of 1929.

The scope of the section has been widened so that it now provides for cases where there are more than two properties. The section uses the word 'mortgages' instead of the word 'charge'. This is because in the amended Act the word charge is used in the sense defined in s 100, and does not include a mortgage. The words 'as against the seller' have been dropped to show, that the right can be enforced against the mortgagee. The section may apply to charges.<sup>95</sup> The section confers a statutory right on the vendee of one property sold to him out of several mortgaged along with that property. Such a right cannot be defeated, unless it is proved that the intention was to extinguish the entire mortgage.<sup>96</sup>

Under s 56 of the TP Act, the mortgage debt is a charge on the property and therefore, the charge remains subsisting on the property so long as it has not been duly discharged.<sup>97</sup>

(2) Marshalling by Purchaser

This section deals with the right of a subsequent purchaser to claim marshalling. It should be contrasted with s 81 which refers to marshalling by a subsequent mortgagee. Marshalling is the converse of contribution, for while marshalling requires that a mortgagee who has the means of satisfying his debt out of several properties shall exercise his right so as not to prejudice the purchaser of one of them, contribution requires that if several properties are liable to a mortgage and the mortgagee has been paid out of one, the others shall not escape. Marshalling arises under this section where property has been sold free from encumbrances, while contribution is applicable where the property has been sold subject to the mortgage.<sup>98</sup>

Illustrations

- (1) Properties X, Y and Z are subject to a mortgage. The mortgagor sells X to A free from incumbrances. Marshalling enables A to require that the mortgagee shall satisfy his mortgage as far as possible out of properties Y and Z.
- (2) Properties X, Y and Z are subject to a mortgage. The mortgagor sells the equity of redemption of Z to A, of Y to B, and of Z to C. If the mortgagee satisfies his mortgage out of X, then A may require B and C to contribute pro-rata to the discharge of the mortgage debt.

The rule of marshalling is expressed by Dart as follows:

If two estates X and Y are subject to a common charge and estate X be sold to A, A will as against his vendor and his representatives have a prima facie equity in the absence of express agreement and whether or not he had notice of the charge, to throw it primarily on estate Y in exoneration of estate X.

In Aldrich v Cooper,<sup>99</sup> Lord Eldon had stated the equitable principle to be that:

a person having two funds shall not by his election disappoint the party having only one fund; and equity, to satisfy both, will throw him, who has two funds, upon that, which can be affected to him only; to the intent that the only fund, to which the other has access, may remain clear to him.

No question of marshalling can arise unless there is a common debtor.<sup>1</sup>

(3) Omission of the Words 'as Against the Seller'

The rule as stated by Dart and as enacted in this section before the amendment, conferred a right only as against the seller. Accordingly, as the mortgagee had a right to proceed against whatever property he chooses and could not be compelled to split his security, the right could not be enforced against the mortgagee.<sup>2</sup> Tara Prasanna v Nilmoni<sup>3</sup> was an exception to this rule, but in that case the mortgagee had foreclosed, and was treated as representing the seller. The section was, therefore, practically a dead letter for the purchaser had a remedy against the seller under s 55(1)(g). The court in execution in the exercise of the discretion under o 34, r 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 adjusted the equities by requiring the mortgagee to proceed first against the unsold property.<sup>4</sup> However, under the amended section the purchaser can insist upon this as of right.

(4) Independent of Notice

The right given to the purchaser by this section is independent of notice. Section 81 has been amended to make it clear that the right to have securities marshalled is independent of notice.<sup>5</sup> This is in accord with the principle that it should not depend upon the will of one creditor to disappoint another. In some cases not falling under the TP Act it was suggested that the purchaser is not entitled to call for marshalling, unless he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.<sup>6</sup> However, no such distinction has actually been made, for the rule as to notice as it stood in s 81 before its amendment, was held not to apply to mortgages before the TP Act,<sup>7</sup> and this was followed by CJ Farran, in the case of a purchaser.<sup>8</sup>

(5) Marshalling between purchaser and purchaser

If the mortgagee in the illustration given by Dart realised his mortgage by sale of X, then the buyer A will be entitled to a charge on Y for the value of X. Thus, if Y is worth Rs 2,000, and X is worth Rs 1,000, and the mortgagee realises his security by the sale of X, A will have a charge on Y for Rs 1,000. In case both properties are sold, the buyer of the first has no charge against the buyer of the second. Dart states that if after X is sold to A, the owner sells Y to B who has notice of the prior sale to X, and of A's charge, then the charge will be enforceable against B.<sup>9</sup> The correctness of this proposition is doubtful, and the courts in India do not apply the rule of marshalling between purchaser and purchaser, and require both purchasers to contribute ratably to the satisfaction of the original charge.<sup>10</sup>

It is obvious that a purchaser of an equity of redemption cannot claim the right to marshal because he has purchased subject to the mortgage. However, supposing of the two properties X and Y which are subject to a mortgage, X is sold to A free from the mortgage and then Y is sold to B, subject to the mortgage, X would be entitled to marshal and to require the mortgage to be realised out of Y. Such a case occurred in Patna.<sup>11</sup> Of the two mortgaged properties, X was sold to A free from encumbrances, and then Y was sold to B, and money to discharge the mortgage was left by the seller with B. But B failed to pay off the mortgage, and the court held that B was not entitled to contribution, but that A was entitled to marshal against B.

(6) Lessee

A lessee is not entitled to the right of marshalling under this section.<sup>12</sup>

(7) Contract to the Contrary

The charge on the unsold property may be excluded by a contract to the contrary. Thus, if X and Y are subject to a mortgage and the mortgagor sells X to A and deposits with A a sum of money to discharge the mortgage and agrees that if the sum is not sufficient he will pay the excess with interest, that is a contract to the contrary, which excludes A's charge on Y and makes the seller personally liable.<sup>13</sup> A contract to the contrary need not be express. It may be implied.<sup>14</sup> The words 'a contract to the contrary' are not restricted to a contract between a mortgagor and a mortgagee only. Such contract may be between the mortgagor and the purchaser.<sup>15</sup>

(8) So as Not to Prejudice

The right of marshalling cannot be exercised so as to prejudice the mortgagee or persons claiming under him or any person having an interest in any of the properties. Whether prejudice would be caused is a question of fact, and it is for the person who invokes the clause to establish such facts; the question of prejudice is linked with the value of the properties involved.<sup>16</sup> There is a similar proviso to s 81. Marshalling would not be allowed where it would impair the security of a subsequent mortgagee. In this connection, see note 'No prejudice to other encumbrancers' under s 81.

(9) Execution Sales

The doctrine of marshalling has been considered with reference to purchasers at execution sales, and it has been said that an execution purchaser cannot claim marshalling.<sup>17</sup> The doctrine has no application at all to execution sales.<sup>18</sup> However, the equitable principle embodied in the section can be evoked in cases of involuntary sales.<sup>19</sup>

Provision by court for encumbrances and sale freed therefrom

- (a) Where immovable property subject to any encumbrance, whether immediately payable or not, is sold by the court or in execution of a decree, or out of Court, the court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of any party to the sale, direct or allow payment into Court,--
  - (1) in case of an annual or monthly sum charged on the property, or of a capital sum charged on a determinable interest in the property--of such amount as, when invested in securities of the Central Government, the Court considers will be sufficient, by means of the interest thereof, to keep down or otherwise provide for that charge, and
  - (2) in any other case of a capital sum charged on the property--of the amount sufficient to meet the encumbrance and any interest due thereon.

But in either case there shall also be paid into Court such additional amount as the Court considers will be sufficient to meet the contingency of further costs, expenses and interest and any other contingency, except depreciation of investments, not exceeding one-tenth part of the original amount to be paid in, unless the Court for special reasons (which it shall record) thinks fit to require a large additional amount.

- (b) Thereupon the Court may, if it thinks fit, and after notice to the encumbrance unless the Court, for reasons to be recorded in writing, thinks fit to dispense with such notice, declare the property to be freed from the incumbrance, and make any order for conveyance, or vesting order, proper for giving effect of the sale, and give directions for the retention and investment of the money in Court.
- (c) After notice served on the persons interested in or entitled to the money or fund in Court, the Court may direct payment or transfer thereof to the persons entitled to receive or give a discharge for the same, and generally may give directions respecting the application or distribution of the capital or income thereof.
- (d) An appeal shall lie from any declaration, order or direction under this section as if the same were a decree.
- (e) In this section "Court" means (1) a High court in the exercise of the ordinary or extraordinary original civil jurisdiction, (2) the Court of a District Judge within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property or any part thereof is situated, (3) any other Court which the State Government may, from time to time, by notification in the official Gazette, declare to be competent to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by this section.

(1) Freedom from Encumbrances

The object of this section is to facilitate the sale of encumbered estates by taking the encumbrance off the title before sale. This procedure also avoids the necessity of joining the encumbrances as parties to the sale.

The section will not apply when a mortgagee's decree for sale has been adjusted out of court. A mortgagee obtained a decree in enforcement of his mortgage. The petitioner negotiated for the purchase of the property. The mortgagee agreed to accept a certain sum in discharge of his decree. The petitioner then purchased the property from the mortgagor, and tendered the agreed sum to the mortgagee. The mortgagee refused to accept it. The petitioner then applied for leave to pay the money into court, and to obtain a declaration that the property was freed from the mortgage. The court held that the section had no application to the case as it involved a question of an adjustment of a decree out of court.<sup>20</sup>

(2) Procedure

The court will not act suo motu. There must be an application by a party to the sale. The power is discretionary and in cases of hardship, eg when the capitalised value of the encumbrance is considerably in excess of the price and the seller prefers to exercise his right of rescission, the court will not make an order for payment into court.<sup>21</sup> Service of notice is not obligatory, and it is believed that an order would be made in a proper case even if the encumbrancer could not be found; but notice should ordinarily be given in order to ascertain the amount due on the encumbrance and for that purpose, the court will construe a will and make a declaration as to future rights.<sup>22</sup> An order under this section is necessary although a fund has been set apart in the administration action.<sup>23</sup>

The English section has been applied to sales by mortgagors.<sup>24</sup> There is a very similar provision in o 34, r 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 enabling a puisne mortgagee to bring the mortgaged property to sale free from the prior mortgage.<sup>25</sup>

(3) One-tenth

The maximum of one-tenth for future contingencies may be exceeded for special reasons.

(4) Direct or allow

The word 'direct' refers to a sale by the court, and the word 'allow' refers to a private sale out of court.<sup>26</sup>

"Mortgage", "mortgagor", "mortgagee", "mortgage-money" and "mortgage-deed" defined

--(a) A mortgage is the transfer of an interest in specific immovable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, an existing or future debt, or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability.

The transferor is called a mortgagor, the transferee a mortgagee; the principal money and interest of which payment is secured for the time being are called the mortgage-money and the instrument (if any) by which the transfer is effected is called a mortgage-deed.

(b) Simple mortgage.--Where, without delivering possession of the mortgaged property, the mortgagor binds himself personally to pay the mortgage-money, and agrees, expressly or impliedly, that, in the event of his failing to pay according to his contract, the mortgagee shall have a right to cause the mortgaged property to be sold and the proceeds of sale to be applied, so far as may be necessary, in payment of the mortgage-money, the transaction is called a simple mortgage and the mortgagee a simple mortgagee.

(c) Mortgage by conditional sale.--Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property-- on a condition that on default of payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date the sale shall become absolute, or on condition that on such payment being made the sale shall become void, or on a condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller, the transaction is called mortagage by conditional sale and the mortagagee, a mortagagee by conditional sale :

Provided that no such transaction shall be deemed to be a mortgage, unless the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale.

(d) Usufructuary mortgage.--Where the mortgagor delivers possession or expressly or by implication binds himself to deliver possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, and authorises him to retain such possession until payment of the mortgage-money, and to receive the rents and profits accruing from the property or any part of such rents and profits and to appropriate the same in lieu of interest, or in payment of the mortgage-money, or partly in lieu of interest or partly in payment of the mortgage-money, the transaction is called an usufructuary mortgage and the mortgagee an usufructuary mortgagee.

(e) English mortgage.--Where the mortgagor binds himself to repay the mortgage-money on a certain date, and transfers the mortgaged property absolutely to the mortgagee, but subject to a proviso that he will re-transfer it to the mortgagor upon payment of the mortgage-money as agreed, the transaction is called an English mortgage.

(f) Mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.--Where a person in any of the following towns, namely, the towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, and in any other town which the State Government concerned may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify in this behalf, delivers to a creditor or his agent documents of title to immovable property, with intent to create a security thereon, the transaction is called a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.

(g) Anomalous mortgage.--A mortgage which is not a simple mortgage, a mortgage by conditional sale, an usufructuary mortgage, an English mortgage or a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds within the meaning of this section is called an anomalous mortgage.

(1) History of Mortgages

In an ancient systems of law, a mortgage was really a pledge-the property being a gage which was forfeited on default of payment. The transaction was effected either by delivery of possession, or by conditional conveyance. In Roman law, the earliest type of security was the fiducia, a conditional conveyance under which the property whatever its value, was forfeited in case of non-payment. This was followed by the pignus which was a transfer not of ownership, but of possession without liability to forfeiture. Then the last stage was the hypotheca, a form of pledge without delivery of possession under which the creditor acquired a power of sale. In Hindu and Mahomedan law, mortgages underwent a similar process of evolution. A mortgage by conditional sale was a very early form of mortgage among Hindus. The usufructuary mortgage with neither power of sale, nor of foreclosure corresponded to the Roman pignus, and the simple mortgage was a later development corresponding to the Roman hypotheca.<sup>1</sup> Among Mahomedans, the mortgage by conditional sale was a device to evade the Islamic prohibition of interest. This was the bye-bil-wafa, literally a sale with a promise, so that the mortgagee enjoyed the rents and profits in lieu of interest and became absolute owner of the property if the debt was not paid. However, the earliest form of Mahomedan security was the rahn or pledge with possession corresponding to the Roman pignus. This developed by slow degrees into the recognition of a pledge without possession with a power of sale.<sup>2</sup> The development was slower than in Hindu law because interest not being added, the security was always sufficient. In England it seems certain that the original mortgage at common law was rather a pledge than a mortgage.<sup>3</sup> The transfer was not of title, but of possession. When the creditor took the profits in discharge of both principal and interest, the transaction was said to be a vivum vadium or living pledge since it worked out its own redemption. When the creditor took the profits merely in satisfaction of interest, it was called a mortuum vadium or a dead pledge. This form of mortgage was similar to the usufructuary mortgage of TP Act. At a later time which cannot be exactly ascertained, the English mortgage took the modern form of a conditional conveyance. The condition was originally one of defeasance, that on repayment, the grant determined and the land reverted to the mortgagor who was entitled to re-enter.<sup>4</sup> Subsequently, the condition became one of reconveyance on repayment as defined in cl (e) of this section. After the common law, mortgage became a mortgage by conditional conveyance, and was modified by three principles of equity.

These are--

1. that equity looks to the essence of the transaction, and that a mortgage is in essence a borrowing transaction;
2. that the borrower is in need of protection, and that a condition that penalizes him is void;
3. that a condition of forfeiture in default of payment on the due date is a penalty.

These same equitable principles have been applied to the law of mortgages in India.

CLAUSE A

(2) Definition-Clause as the Essentials

Justice Mahmood in Gopal v Parsotam<sup>5</sup> says of the definition of mortgage in this section:

Mortgage as understood in this country cannot be defined better than by the definition adopted by the Legislature in s 58 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882). That definition has not in any way altered the law, but, on the contrary, has only formulated in clear language the notions of mortgage as understood by all the writers of textbooks on Indian mortgages. Every word of the definition is borne out by the decisions of Indian Courts of Justice.

The definition of simple mortgage would appear to be taken from Macpherson's Law of Mortgages.<sup>6</sup> It is almost the same as the classic definition given by MR Lindley, in Santley v Wilde:<sup>7</sup>

A mortgage is a conveyance of land or an assignment of chattels as a security for the payment of a debt or the discharge of some other obligation for which it is given.

With reference to the definition of mortgage by conditional sale under cl (c), the Privy Council said that it may be assumed that the framers of the TP Act in s 58, cl (c) intended to state the existing law and practice in India.<sup>8</sup>

The three forms of mortgage in s 58(b), (c) and (d) were well-known in Hindu and Mahomedan law. Simple mortgages were called in Bengal- Bhandhaki-khat; in the United Provinces- Rehan, Arh, Mustagraq,<sup>9</sup> in Bombay - Taran Gahan or Nazar Gahan;<sup>10</sup> in Madras- Dhrista Bhandaka or Adaimana patram<sup>11</sup> or Tanaka<sup>12</sup> or Panayam.<sup>13</sup> Mortgages by conditional sale were called in Bengal- Khatkabala or Bye-bil-Wafa;<sup>14</sup> in the United Provinces- Bye-bil-Wafa;<sup>15</sup> in Bombay- Gahan Lahan;<sup>16</sup> in Madras- Muddata Kriyam<sup>17</sup> or Peruarthum.<sup>18</sup> Usufructuary mortgages were called in Bengal- Khai Khalasi or Bhagbandak or Bandaknama;<sup>19</sup> in Madras- Duggubhogiyam or Swadhin Adha-manam or Kanom<sup>20</sup> or Otti.<sup>21</sup> English mortgages were limited to the Presidency towns, and to Europeans in the Mofussil.

The Supreme Court in Kedar Lal v Hari Lal,<sup>22</sup> has observed that the whole law of mortgage in India including the law of contribution arising out of a transaction of mortgage, is now statutory and is embodied in the TP Act read with the Code of Civil Procedure. The court cannot travel beyond these statutory provisions.

(3) Mortgage

A mortgage is a transfer of an interest in specific immovable property as security for the repayment of a debt. But such interest itself is immovable property.<sup>23</sup> The nature of the right transferred depends upon the form of the mortgage. In a simple mortgage, what is transferred is a power of sale, which is one of the component rights that make up the aggregate of ownership. In a usufructuary mortgage, what is transferred is a right of possession and enjoyment of the usufruct.<sup>24</sup> In a conditional mortgage and in an English mortgage, the right transferred is, in form, a transfer of a right of ownership subject to a condition. In each case, whatever be the form of the mortgage, there is a transfer of some interest only, and not a transfer of the whole interest of the mortgagor.<sup>25</sup>

The characteristic feature of mortgages is that the right in the property created by the transfer is accessory to the right to recover the debt.<sup>26</sup> The debt subsists in a mortgage, while a transaction by which, a debt is extinguished is not a mortgage, but a sale. This is well illustrated by the case of Nidha Sah v Murli Dhar,<sup>27</sup> where the deed was purported to be a deed of mortgage with possession of certain villages for a period of 14 years. The deed provided that at the expiry of the term, the mortgagors were to come into possession of the mortgaged villages without settlement of accounts, and that the mortgagee should then have no power whatsoever in respect of the said estate, but should return the mortgage deed to the mortgagors without their repaying the mortgage money. The mortgagee refused to return such villages as he had, on the ground that he had not received the full number of villages, and had not been able to recoup himself. The Privy Council said that the deed was not a security for the payment of any money and that the transaction was not a mortgage but a grant of land for a fixed term free of rent and that, as the suit was not on contract but on title, the so-called mortgagors were entitled to recover possession. A sale deed passed by a mortgagor in favour of the mortgagee containing a recital that in case the mortgagee is dispossessed on account of some defect in title of the mortgagor, the mortgagee would be entitled to renew his debt, does not amount to a mortgage as no specific immovable property was charged.<sup>28</sup> Where the suit land was mortgaged for a sum advanced to the mortgagors and later while raising the additional debt a co-mortgagee was inducted, it was held that increase in mortgage money, induction of a co-mortgagee and non-defining of their shares did not alter the situation that the original mortgagee continued as before the mortgagee of the suit land.<sup>29</sup>

When a mortgagor mortgages the land with possession, he does not cease to be its owner. The equity of redemption still vests in him and on redemption, he gets back possession of the mortgaged land.<sup>30</sup>

(4) Construction of Mortgage Deed

No particular form of words is necessary for the creation of a mortgage. It is sufficient that the transfer should be originally intended as security for the debt. The court will ascertain the intention by looking at the substance and essence of the transaction, and not the mere form of the deeds. Even if the deed calls itself a mortgage, its nature will be determined not by the name the parties give it, but by the jural relationship constituted by it. The guidelines for deciding whether a transaction is a lease or mortgage, contemplate that the name given to the document is not conclusive. The question has to be decided with reference to the predominant intention of the parties as gathered from the recitals and the terms of the documents, and the surrounding circumstances including conduct of the parties. In the case of a mortgage, there is a transfer of interest to secure payment of debt and in the case of a lease, there is a transfer of right to enjoy the property.<sup>31</sup>

Thus, in a Bombay case,<sup>32</sup> the deed was called karzrokha (or debt note), but was held not to be mortgage. On the other hand, in an Allahabad case<sup>33</sup> the deed was construed as a mortgage, although the word mortgage did not occur in it. Similarly, in another Bombay case<sup>34</sup> the creditor was in possession under a previous mortgage and by the new deed was entitled to receive the profits in lieu of interest 'so far as they would go' and to hold as a purchaser, and the debtor would not be liable to repay unless he adopted a son. The deed was called a mortgage, but was construed to be a sale liable to be converted into a mortgage, but the name given by the parties is not to be lost sight of especially if the deed is ambiguous.<sup>35</sup> In a Madras case, a debtor who was not able to repay the amount of the debt granted to the creditor, a right to occupy and enjoy certain land for a period of 20 years; it was held that the transaction was not a mortgage, but a lease.<sup>36</sup> In a Delhi case, though a stipulation in the letter confirming equitable mortgage restricted the liability to Rs 24 lakhs, on a reading of the document as a whole, it was held that the liability of the mortgagor was restricted not only to an amount of Rs 24 lakhs, but would also cover interest thereon and all other costs, charges and commission.<sup>37</sup>

The terms and conditions contained in the document are necessary to adjudicate upon the nature and the character of the document as to whether it is a mortgage by a conditional sale, or a sale with a condition of re-transfer.<sup>38</sup>

(5) Covenant Not to Alienate

A covenant not to alienate does not amount to a mortgage. If the debtor promises to repay the debt and covenants that until payment he will not alienate any property, the transaction does not amount to a mortgage, for there is no transfer of an interest in the property.<sup>39</sup> In Mohan Lal v Indomati,<sup>40</sup> a full Bench of the Allahabad High Court held that:

A covenant against alienation may be said to be a covenant divesting the executant of a portion of his interest in the property in question, but it does not vest that interest in anyone else, and accordingly, a bond in which the obligor covenanted not to transfer certain property and added the words 'if I shall do so, then such transfer shall be invalid' was held not to be a mortgage. A covenant not to transfer, however, may be associated with words expressly making the property a security for the debt.<sup>41</sup>

(6) Sale with a Condition of Retransfer

A sale with a condition of retransfer is not a mortgage, for the relationship of debtor and creditor does not subsist, and there is no debt for which the transfer is a security. It is not a partial transfer, but a transfer of all rights in the property reserving only a personal right of repurchase or pre-emption, which is lost if not exercised within the stipulated time. This distinction was made in the case of Alderson v White,<sup>42</sup> and it was accepted by the Privy Council in Bhagwan Sahai v Bhagwan Din.<sup>43</sup> Their Lordships quoted with approval the following passage from Alderson v White:

The rule of law on this subject is one dictated by common sense that prima facie an absolute conveyance containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor is to exist between the parties do not cease to be an absolute conveyance and become a mortgage merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to repurchase.

(7) Extrinsic Evidence

Although the difference in the legal effect of a sale with a condition of repurchase and a mortgage by conditional sale is clear, it is often a matter of extreme difficulty to decide which of these two transactions a particular document, or set of documents discloses.<sup>44</sup> The distinction is purely one of intention—whether it was intended that the relation of debtor and creditor should subsist,<sup>45</sup> and the question is what evidence is relevant to prove that intention.

The Indian Evidence Act 1872 by s 92 excludes evidence of an inconsistent oral agreement, and provides only for cases of fraud invalidating a document. The section does not provide for the case where there is no fraud at the time of execution of the deed, but the grantee subsequently insists that an ostensible sale is a real sale.

This principle has been followed by the Supreme Court in Pandit Chunchun Zha v Sheikh Ebadat Ali,<sup>46</sup> and in Bhaskar Waman Joshi v Narayan Rambilas Agarwal.<sup>47</sup> In the later case, J Shah as he then was, delivering the judgment of the court, observed:

If the words are plain and unambiguous they must in the light of the evidence of surrounding circumstances be given their true legal effect. If there is ambiguity in the language employed, the intention may be ascertained from the contents of the deed with such extrinsic evidence as may by law be permitted to be adduced to show in what manner the language of the deed was related to existing facts. Oral evidence of intention is not admissible in interpreting the covenants of the deed but evidence to explain or even to contradict the recitals as distinguished from the terms of the document may of course be given. Evidence of contemporaneous conduct is always admissible as a surrounding circumstance; but evidence as to subsequent conduct of the parties is inadmissible.<sup>48</sup>

(8) Section 92, (Sixth proviso) Indian Evidence Act

The reference to extrinsic evidence showing in what way the language of the document is related to existing facts is the same exception as proviso (6) of s 92. That proviso is in these terms:

'Any fact may be proved which shows in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts.'

The question of admissibility of evidence must, therefore, be decided solely on the terms of s 92. The section, however, does not preclude oral evidence to contradict a recital of fact in a written contract. Thus, it may be shown that no consideration was paid though payment may have been recited in the document.<sup>49</sup> Again, the contemporaneous conduct of parties may be proved if it is relevant under proviso (b) to s 92, and even in Balkishen v Legge, the fact that the parties ascertained the so-called price by calculating the amount due on a separate account between the parties, and adding it to the balance due on a former mortgage, was held to indicate that the transaction was a mortgage. However, the subsequent conduct of the parties cannot be considered; for evidence of such conduct would only be relevant on the ground that it leads to the inference that there was a contemporaneous oral agreement that the sale deed should operate as a mortgage.<sup>50</sup> In Maung Kyin v Ma Shwe La,<sup>51</sup> the Privy Council explained that though as between the parties to an absolute conveyance oral evidence was not admissible to prove that the transaction was a mortgage, yet it was open to a third party to produce evidence to show the real nature of a transaction. The courts were, therefore, practically limited to the document itself, and devised various criteria for determining whether the intention was to mortgage or to sell. A number of these tests, based on a passage in Butler's preface to Coke on Littleton, are set out in the under-noted cases.<sup>52</sup> In Pandit Chunchun Jha v Sheikh Ebada Ali,<sup>53</sup> the Supreme Court observed that much industry had been expended in some of the high courts in collecting and analysing decisions on these points, and proceeded:

We think that this is a fruitless task because two documents are seldom expressed in identical terms and when it is necessary to consider the attendant circumstances, the imponderable variables which that brings in its train make it impossible to compare one case with another. Each case must be decided on its own facts.

The following tests have, however, been applied:<sup>54</sup>

- (1) the existence of a debt;<sup>55</sup>
- (2) the period of repayment, a short period being indicative of a sale, and a long period of a mortgage;<sup>56</sup> but the fact that time was made the essence of the contract to repurchase is not decisive;<sup>57</sup>
- (3) the continuance of the grantor in possession indicates a mortgage;<sup>58</sup>
- (4) a stipulation for the payment of interest on repayment indicates a mortgage;<sup>59</sup>
- (5) a price below the true value indicates a mortgage;<sup>60</sup> a fair market value is strong evidence that the transaction is a sale;<sup>61</sup>
- (6) the fact that no application for transfer of name was made till long after the sale, indicates a mortgage;<sup>62</sup>
- (7) the right of redemption and foreclosure are co-extensive. The absence of such a right of mortgagee could only mean that it is a conditional sale.<sup>63</sup>

A document described the transaction as one of sale, and further provided that the transferee would become an absolute owner if the amount paid by the transferee was not returned by the transferor within 21 years. It was held that the fact that such a long period was provided for exercising the right of re-purchase showed that the transaction was a mortgage by conditional sale, and not a sale with the condition for repurchase.<sup>64</sup> Mere description of a document would not be sufficient to hold it to be a sale, when in substance it is a document of mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>65</sup>

In a Madras case, in the document, the condition of sale and resale were engrafted in the same document, wherein the purchaser was specifically prohibited from encumbering the property within a period of five years stipulated for repurchase. There were also substantial differences between the actual value of the property and consideration as stipulated in the deed. It was held that it was a mortgage by conditional sale, and not a sale with a condition for retransfer.<sup>66</sup>

A deed transferred possession of property worth rupees one lakh in favour of X for a consideration of Rs 45,000. The deed referred to a cash loan of Rs 45,000 and provided that upon payment of Rs 45,000 by the executant, X would return the property to the executant. The transaction was held to be a mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>67</sup>

If the words of a document are clear, effect must be given to them and any extraneous inquiry into what the parties thought or intended, must be ruled out.<sup>68</sup>

In deciding whether the transaction is a mortgage or a sale, the intention as gathered from the document is the determining factor.<sup>69</sup> According to the Orissa High Court, s 92 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 does not bar the admission of oral evidence to prove that a document was not intended to operate as a sale deed, but as a mortgage. However, in the particular case, on the facts, the document was held to be a sale.<sup>70</sup> According to the Madras High Court, for ascertaining the intention, it is permissible to refer to surrounding circumstances, for which oral evidence is admissible.<sup>71</sup>

Where by a document, the executant conveys certain property absolutely to the purchaser without imposing any obligation on the part of the vendor to recover the property on payment of price, but gives the vendor only an option to do so, the document does not create any relationship of debtor and creditor, and where there is no stipulation of payment of interest or an indication that the property was given by way of security for loan, the transaction is an outright sale, and not a mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>72</sup>

In an Assam case, there was no debt in existence at the time of execution of the document. The period of reconveyance stipulated was only one year, and the purchaser had been in possession since the purchase. There was no stipulation for interest. All these circumstances showed that the transaction was an outright sale, with the condition of repurchase within a stipulated period.<sup>73</sup> In an Allahabad case, the landlord executed a sale deed in favour of the tenant, on receiving consideration money in respect of tenanted premises. No agreement to reconvey the property was proved. No mention was made in the sale deed that the relationship of landlord and tenant subsisted, even after the execution of document. It was held that the document was an absolute sale, and not a mortgage. Tenancy over the shop merged with the right of ownership of the tenant, and it could not be revived on the execution of subsequent sale deed by the tenant in favour of the landlord's wife.<sup>74</sup>

In a Madhya Pradesh case, it was held that where a condition of repurchase is embodied in the document which effects the sale, the presumption is that it is a mortgage.<sup>75</sup> In a Bombay case, a period of five years was stipulated as the period within which the transferor may re-purchase the land. If the amount was not paid within the stipulated period, the deed was to be treated as a permanent sale deed. No charge was created, nor any interest provided for. The deed was held not to be a mortgage, but a sale with a condition of re-purchase.<sup>76</sup>

The Rajasthan High Court in Askaran v Madan Lal,<sup>77</sup> relying upon the judgement of Chunchun Jha v Ibadat Ali<sup>78</sup> held that if the sale and agreement to repurchase are embodied in separate documents, then the transaction cannot be a mortgage irrespective of whether the documents are contemporaneously executed, but the converse does not hold good, that is to say the mere fact that there is only one document, does not necessarily mean that it must be a mortgage, and cannot be a sale. If the condition of repurchase is embodied in the document that effects or purports to effect the sale, then it is a matter for the construction which was meant.

In applying these tests, the courts put the onus on to the party alleging that an ostensible sale deed was a mortgage;<sup>79</sup> but this is now, after 1929, subject to the rule that a transaction embodied in one document is prima facie a mortgage.<sup>80</sup> In case of ambiguity, the courts lean to the construction of a mortgage.<sup>81</sup> The above tests are not exhaustive, but illustrative.<sup>82</sup>

It has been suggested that the test is whether the agreement to reconvey was part of the consideration of the transfer.<sup>83</sup> In order to constitute a mortgage by conditional sale, there must be an ostensible and not a real sale, and it must comply with the three conditions mentioned in s 58(c).<sup>84</sup>

(9) Breach of Condition

A deed of re-conveyance contained a clause that on failure to perform certain conditions, the re-conveyance shall stand cancelled. The person bound by the condition committed a breach, but sought to invoke s 74, Indian Contract Act 1872 Act for relief from the consequences of the breach. It was held that s 74 could not be invoked for the purpose.<sup>85</sup>

(10) Ejectment of Mortgagee

In case of a mortgage, the mortgagor has no right in law to eject a mortgage until the mortgage is redeemed. Even though a mortgage was not by a registered instrument, if the entry of the mortgagee into the property was as a mortgagee, nature of his possession would continue to be as mortgagee, unless there is evidence to show that, at any point of time, he asserted his adverse title, by repudiating his possession as mortgagee<sup>86</sup>

(11) Onus of Proof

Where the question is whether a document which squarely falls within the definition of mortgage by conditional sale, is a sale, within condition of repurchase, the presumption may be that the document is a mortgage by conditional sale, and the onus will be upon the defendant to displace the presumption.<sup>87</sup>

Striking a note of caution, the Supreme Court has observed that having regard to the niceties of distinctions between a mortgage by conditional sale and a sale with an option to repurchase, one should be guided by the terms of the document alone without much help from the case law. It, however, added that cases could be referred for the purposes of interpreting a particular clause to gather the intention.<sup>88</sup>

(12) Agreement for Mortgage

An agreement to mortgage may, in English law, amount to an equitable mortgage, which can be enforced according to its terms, but no such mortgage is recognised in Indian law.<sup>89</sup> An agreement to mortgage gives rise only to a personal obligation, which does not constitute either a mortgage, or charge.<sup>90</sup> An agreement to mortgage is not capable of specific performance, for the court will not enforce an agreement to make a loan of money, whether on security or not.<sup>91</sup> In South African Territories Ltd v Wallington,<sup>92</sup> Lord Macnaghten said that, 'specific performance of a contract to lend money cannot be enforced is so well established and obviously so wholesome a rule, that it would be idle to say a word about it.' The remedy for the breach of an agreement to mortgage is damages.<sup>93</sup> The measure of damages is the interest for the time the money is likely to lie idle, plus actual expenses incurred.<sup>94</sup> However, when the lender has advanced the money either in whole or in part on an agreement to mortgage, and the borrower is not willing to repay the same at once, the court will specifically enforce the agreement.<sup>95</sup> In the converse case of a mortgagor who has executed a mortgage, but has not been paid the full amount of the consideration, the mortgagor cannot sue for the balance, but he may sue in damages or sue to redeem.<sup>96</sup> In such a case, the mortgage is valid for the amount advanced.<sup>97</sup> On the other hand, if the mortgage is ususfructuary, this rule is not applied, and the mortgagor may sue for the unpaid balance of the mortgage money.<sup>98</sup>

Clause as to the Transfer

(13) Transfer

The transfer must be to a living person or persons (s 5). Thus, a security bond by which a person charges his property to secure performance of the decree, is not a mortgage, for the court to which it is given is not a juridical person.<sup>99</sup> Where the security bond was executed in favour of the Registrar of the court, for the benefit of the decree holders, it was held to be a mortgage.<sup>1</sup>

(14) Formal Expression of Transfer Not Necessary

It is not necessary that the transfer should be formally expressed. If the transfer is not in express terms, it is sufficient if the instrument taken as a whole operates as a transfer.<sup>2</sup>

(15) Transfer of an Interest

These words stand in contrast with the words 'transfer of ownership', occurring in s 54 in the definition of sale. In a sale, all the rights of ownership which the transferor has, pass to the transferee. In a mortgage, some rights are transferred to the mortgagee, and some remain vested in the mortgagor. The transfer of the right to receive rents and profits from tenants for a term of years is a transfer of an interest in land, and may constitute a mortgage.<sup>3</sup> The words 'transfer of an interest' also distinguished a mortgage from an agreement to mortgage, and from a charge. In an agreement to mortgage no right in rem is transferred at all, but only a personal obligation is created. Similarly, in a charge no right in rem is created, but the right is something more than a personal obligation; for it is a jus ad rem, ie, a right to payment out of the property specified.<sup>4</sup> There is, therefore, very little difference between a charge and a simple mortgage. The practical difference is that a simple mortgage being a right in rem is good against subsequent transferees, while a charge is only good as against a subsequent transferee for value, with notice or a volunteer, with or without notice.<sup>5</sup> An agreement which gives immovable property as security for the satisfaction of a debt,<sup>6</sup> or for payment of a maintenance allowance without transferring any interest in the property, constitutes a charge on the property, and is not a mortgage.<sup>7</sup> As a mortgage is a transfer of a right in rem, a purchaser is not affected by a subsequent mortgage given by his vendor.<sup>8</sup> In a Patna case<sup>9</sup> J Das said:

Now the broad distinction between a mortgage and a charge is this: that whereas a charge only gives a right to payment out of a particular fund or particular property without transferring that fund or property, a mortgage is in essence a transfer of an interest in specific immovable property.

The interest of the mortgagor and of the mortgagee may each be the subject of another mortgage. The mortgagor may make a second or puisne mortgage of his right of redemption,<sup>10</sup> and the mortgagee may make a sub-mortgage in his own interest in the property.<sup>11</sup>

There is no inconsistency between a possessory mortgage and a 'lease back'. The two transactions can exist simultaneously. A transaction of possessory mortgage cannot be converted into one of simple mortgage merely by reason of the contemporaneous transaction of lease back, because that will be contrary to s 92 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.<sup>12</sup>

Successive suits for redemption of mortgage can be filed till right of redemption is not extinguished. Having regard to the provision of s 60 of the TP Act and o 23, rr 1 and 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it will have to be held that dismissal of earlier suit for redemption whether as abated or as withdrawn or in default, would not debar the mortgagor from the filing of a subsequent suit for redemption, and that such second suit for redemption to redeem the same mortgage can be brought so long as the mortgage subsists, and the right of redemption is not extinguished by efflux of time or by a decree of court passed in the prescribed form. This is because the right of redemption is an incident of a subsisting mortgage, and is inseparable from it so that the right is co-extensive with the mortgage itself. Further, if the mortgagee fails to establish that the old decree extinguished the right to redeem, there is no ground for saying that the old decree operates as res judicata, and the courts are prevented from trying the second suit under s 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure.<sup>13</sup>

(16) Specific immovable property

In order to create a mortgage it is necessary to specify the immovable property. The description must at least be sufficient to identify the property according to the requirements of s 21 and 22 of the Registration Act 1908. In one case,<sup>14</sup>s 29 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 and s 93 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 were referred to, and in another,<sup>15</sup> the maxim id certum est quod certum reddi potest was applied. But the word 'specific' shows that the description should not only be free from ambiguity and uncertainty, but also that it should be specific, as distinguished from general. It has the same meaning in the phrase 'specifically mortgaged' occurring in s 22 of the Dekkan Agriculturists' Relief Act 1879.<sup>16</sup> In a Madras case,<sup>17</sup> it was said that it was sufficient if the indication of the hypotheca is sufficiently precise to enable the land to be determined even after a lapse of time.

The following description was held to be sufficiently specific:

'house situated in Ghaziabad owned and possessed by us';<sup>18</sup>

'our rights and property in the aforesaid taluka, Rajapur';<sup>19</sup>

'all the properties appertaining to entire bhag';<sup>20</sup>

although the properties were wrongly described in the particulars 'our zamindari property'.<sup>21</sup> A description by reference to a specific description in another deed is sufficient. So a mortgage of land and village comprised in the sanad of a talukdari estate was held by the Privy Council to be sufficiently specific.<sup>22</sup> On the other hand, general descriptions such as

'my house and landed property';<sup>23</sup>

'our property with all rights and interests therein';<sup>24</sup>

'the whole of my property';<sup>25</sup>

are bad. But the cases are not consistent, for, in an Allahabad case,<sup>26</sup> a mortgage of 'all my wealth and property' was held to be valid. This is erroneous, for the mere fact that the debtor binds his general estate, is not sufficient to create a mortgage.<sup>27</sup> In another case,<sup>28</sup> a mortgage of 'our one biswa five biswansi shares' was held valid, and it was said that oral evidence was admissible to show that it meant the share in the mortgagor's village.

(17) Immovable Property Fixtures, etc

It has been held that machinery in a mortgaged building does not form part of the security, unless it is attached to the building for the permanent beneficial enjoyment thereof.<sup>29</sup>

(18) Purpose

The purpose or object of a mortgage is to secure a debt. A transfer made for the purpose of discharging a debt is not a mortgage.<sup>30</sup> Thus, if A transfers land to B for a term of years in satisfaction of the debt, this is not a mortgage, but a grant of land for a term free from rent.<sup>31</sup> A recovers possession of the land at the end of the term on his title, and not by way of redemption. The words of the definition 'for the purpose of securing the payment of money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, an existing or future debt, or the performance of an engagement that may give rise to a pecuniary liability' are a paraphrase of the words in s 2 of the English Conveyancing Act 1881, now re-enacted in s 205 (1)(XVI) of the Law of Property Act 1925, 'for securing money or money's worth.'

(19) Money Advanced or to be Advanced

A mortgage may not be for a specific sum, but to secure a current account between the parties upto a limit named (s 79).

Burden of proof is on the party alleging a running security.<sup>32</sup> It is sufficient if the money is left at the mortgagor's disposal in a bank deposit.<sup>33</sup> Where only part of the mortgage money is advanced, the mortgage is good security for the part advanced.<sup>34</sup> In a Madras case, it was said the mortgagor in such a case had an option to cancel,<sup>35</sup> but this is incorrect and ignores what CJ Farran in Tatia v Babaji<sup>36</sup> calls 'the radical distinction between a perfected conveyance and a contract.'

In State of Kerala v Cochin Chemical Refineries,<sup>37</sup> the Supreme Court, approving Tatia v Babaji, has held that a transaction of mortgage does not become void or ineffective merely because the mortgage fails to advance the amount undertaken to be advanced by him.

Illustration

A mortgaged property to B by a deed executed on May. B advanced the money secured by the mortgage a week later on 10 May. Meanwhile on 7 May A sold the property to C. C contended that as the consideration had not been paid at the time of his sale, he was not bound by the mortgage. Held that the mortgage was effective from the date of execution, and that C's purchase was subject to the mortgage.<sup>38</sup>

The Punjab view that the non-payment of full consideration invalidates the mortgage<sup>39</sup> is incorrect, unless it is restricted to cases where the parties agree that the mortgage shall not be operative till the full amount is paid. If the mortgage money is not advanced in full, the remedy is by way of redemption or damages. He cannot file a suit for specific performance of the agreement to lend the whole amount.<sup>40</sup> If there is no consideration at all, the mortgage is a nullity.<sup>41</sup> If the mortgagee has parted with possession, he cannot claim the return of a proportionate extent of the land, and misuse profits of such proportion.<sup>42</sup>

It has been held that the court can go into the question of consideration. In Supreme Court on the facts, the mortgage was held to be fictitious, and to have been executed with ulterior motive.<sup>43</sup>

(20) Future Debt

The future debt referred to in the section may be a contingent liability, a mortgage to secure the payment of the respondent's costs in an appeal,<sup>44</sup> or to further secure a mortgage against the loss of his existing security.<sup>45</sup>

The Engagement and Parties Thereto

(21) Performance of an Engagement

The word 'engagement' means a contract and the limitation to such 'as may give rise to pecuniary liability' includes cases in which there is a legal obligation to pay damages,<sup>46</sup> or to pay for the value of improvements due to a person who is to continue to be in possession of the land.<sup>47</sup> This limitation does not occur in the definition of mortgage given in the Indian Stamp Act 1899.

Illustration

A borrows paddy from another cultivator, B, and mortgages his field to secure repayment of the paddy and the payment of further paddy by way of interest. The engagement to return paddy is one which may give rise to pecuniary liability and the transaction is a mortgage as defined in this section.<sup>48</sup>

(22) Mortgagor

The word is explained in s 59A to include a person deriving title under a mortgagor—but even before the enactment of the section it was used in this sense. An absolute owner can mortgage, unless he is under some disability, statutory or personal. One of the several co-owners, whether tenants in common or joint tenants, can mortgage their share,<sup>49</sup> but in the case of a joint tenancy, such a mortgage severs the joint tenancy.<sup>50</sup> Where joint owners mortgage property, they are each jointly and severally liable.<sup>51</sup> A minor being unable to contract, cannot transfer by mortgage.<sup>52</sup> As to whether a minor, who has falsely represented himself to be a major, can be estopped from pleading his minority, the cases were conflicting; some holding that the mortgage is validated by estoppel,<sup>53</sup> others that it is not.<sup>54</sup> The point is now settled by the Privy Council decision in Sadiq Ali Khan v Jai Kishori,<sup>55</sup> that a deed executed by a minor being a nullity is incapable of founding a plea of estoppel.

When a mortgage is executed by several persons, some of whom are minors and pardanashin ladies who had not executed the deed in accordance with law, the execution is not invalid as regards the rest, and the mortgage is valid and binding on them.<sup>56</sup> A mortgage by a judgment debtor of his property while it is under the management of the collector to whom decrees against the judgment debtor have been transferred for execution is, under para 11 of the third schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, absolutely void and not merely void as against the collector and those claiming under him,<sup>57</sup> but the personal liability of the mortgagor is not affected.<sup>58</sup> Even if the claim on the personal covenant is abandoned, the mortgagee is entitled to restitution under s 65 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.<sup>59</sup> Guardians of minors and managers of estates of disqualified persons can mortgage subject to restrictions imposed by personal or statutory law. Thus, the guardian of a minor's property under the Guardians and Wards Act may mortgage with the sanction of the court;<sup>60</sup> though a mortgage without such sanction is voidable, and not void.<sup>61</sup> A Hindu widow under Mitakshara Law cannot mortgage her husband's property so as to bind the reversionary heir except for legal necessity. An executor or administrator can make a valid mortgage, and the mortgagee is not bound to see to the application of the mortgage money.<sup>62</sup>

In a Privy Council case,<sup>63</sup> one of the questions at issue was whether the mortgagees who took a mortgage from the executors had constructive notice of any defect in the proposed exercise of their powers by the executors under the will. It was held that a lender dealing with an executor has no duty to inquire into facts outside the will as those facts existed immediately prior to the testator's death. It was pointed out that much of the usefulness of the statutory power conferred by s 307 of the Indian Succession Act 1925 on executors in India would be nullified if such a duty of inquiry were to be imposed on a party dealing with executors. Assuming that the executors were not entitled to use the immovable properties for the purposes of the business, the question was:

did the mortgagees know, or were they so put on their enquiry that constructive knowledge must be imparted to them, that the executors were not so entitled?

The question was answered in the negative. There was no evidence that the mortgagees knew anything outside the terms of the will and the recital in the mortgage, and the Privy Council was unable to hold that the mortgagees had any such notice. Further, the mortgagees had no duty, on the facts, to make such inquiry. Accordingly, they got a good title from the executors.

Under s 19(2)(g) of the Indian Partnership Act 1932, in the absence of a usage or a custom or trade to the contrary, the implied authority of a partner does not empower him to transfer immovable property belonging to the firm. However, a mortgage by a partner in a commercial firm of immovable property to secure a partnership debt has been recognized by the Judicial Committee.<sup>64</sup> The manager of a joint Hindu family firm can bind the coparceners by a mortgage of family property for the purposes of carrying on the family business.<sup>65</sup> The requirements insisted upon by courts in upholding mortgages by pardanishin ladies has been dealt with in several cases.<sup>66</sup>

(23) Who may be a Mortgagee

The word 'mortgagee' is explained in s 59A to include a person deriving title under a mortgagee; and was so used even before the insertion of this section. Any person capable of holding property may be a mortgagee. The disability of a minor to contract does not disqualify him from being a transferee.<sup>67</sup>

A minor may, therefore, be a mortgagee.<sup>68</sup> Although a corporation may act ultra vires in accepting a mortgage, the corporation may be entitled to recover the money lent, though the charter of the corporation may be liable to forfeiture.<sup>69</sup>

If no person is named as mortgagee, the instrument cannot be a mortgage. A security bond given to the court cannot be enforced as a mortgage, for the court is not a juridical person.<sup>70</sup>

Mortgage Money

The expression is defined in s 58(A) as the principal money and the interest, the payment of which is secured for the time being. There were conflicting decisions as to whether the interest referred to in this section included interest after due date awarded by way of damages, or under the Interest Act. Some courts held that it did,<sup>71</sup> while others held that it did not, and that interest awarded by way of damages was not recoverable out of the mortgaged property, but was to be treated as a decree for damages.<sup>72</sup> The amended o 34, r 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure now makes it clear that such interest is included in 'mortgage money.' But there may be circumstances justifying the court in refusing interest after the date fixed in the decree, as when the mortgagee filed an appeal which was pending for two years.<sup>73</sup> The general rule is that in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the mortgagee is entitled to treat the interest due under the mortgage as a charge on the estate.<sup>74</sup>

The mere fact that there is an express reference to interest in the personal covenant, but no express reference to interest in the hypothecation clause, it was held not to imply a contract to the contrary.<sup>75</sup> Instances of contracts to the contrary excluding interest from the charge will be found in the undernoted cases.<sup>76</sup>

Sub-mortgage

(24) Sub-mortgages

As already explained,<sup>77</sup> the interest of the mortgagor and of the mortgagee may each be the subject of assignment either absolutely, or by way of security. The mortgagor may assign his equity absolutely to a purchaser, or he may make a second or puisne mortgage of his equity of redemption. The mortgagee may also assign his interest absolutely to a purchaser, or may make a sub-mortgage of his mortgagee's interest. The rights and liabilities of puisne mortgagees are dealt with in ss 91 to 94. The TP Act does not, however, deal with sub-mortgages. A sub-mortgagee does not stand in a higher position than the mortgagee. He is bound by the state of accounts between the mortgagor and mortgagee.<sup>78</sup> An assignment of the mortgagee's interest either absolutely, or by way of sub-mortgagee is a transfer of immovable property, and requires registration.<sup>79</sup>

A sub-mortgage, being a mortgage, requires attestation.<sup>80</sup>

Under s 3, a mortgage debt is not an actionable claim, and the transfer is not subject to ss 130, 131, or 132 of TP Act.

In England, although a mortgage debt is a chose in action, yet the assignee of a mortgage debt is in a stronger position than the assignee of an unsecured debt. The law on this point by LJ Sterling in this judgment in Taylor v London and County Banking Co<sup>81</sup> is:

Although a mortgage debt is a chose in action, yet, where the subject of the security is land, the mortgagee is treated as having 'an interest in land' and priorities are governed by the rules applicable to interests in land, and not by the rules which apply to interests in personalty.

It is stated by Sir William Grant in Jones v Gibbons:<sup>82</sup>

a mortgage consists partly of the estate in the land, partly of the debt. So far as it conveys the estate, the assignment" -- that is of the mortgage -- "is absolute and complete the moment it is made according to the forms of law. Undoubtedly, it is not necessary to give notice to the mortgagor, that the mortgage has been assigned, in order to make it valid and effectual. The estate being absolute at law, the debtor has no means of redeeming it, but, by paying the money. Therefore he, who has the estate, has in effect the debt; as the estate can never be taken from him except by payment of the debt.

In a Bombay case,<sup>83</sup> the sub-mortgage was in 1896, and the mortgagor without notice of the sub-mortgage made a final payment to the mortgagee, which discharged the mortgage in 1900. The payment was held to be valid as against the sub-mortgagee, and the fact that the sub-mortgage was registered did not imply notice. Where a mortgagee sub-mortgages his mortgage to another person without the knowledge of the original mortgagor, and the original mortgagor pays off the amount to the mortgagee, the sub-mortgagee's rights against the land are extinguished. The sub-mortgage is only good to the extent of the amount due on the mortgage, and the payment of the mortgage debt extinguishes the sub-mortgagee's security.<sup>84</sup> However, if the original mortgagor has notice of the sub-mortgage, he cannot dispossess the sub-mortgagee without redeeming him.<sup>85</sup>

Similarly, as s 132 does not apply, the assignee of the mortgage debt is not under that section subject to all the equities to which the assignor (the mortgagee) was subject. In a Madras case,<sup>86</sup> the court refused to allow as against the assignee of the mortgage a right of equitable set off which would have been available against the mortgagee.

Assignee Subject to Mortgagee's Liabilities

Although the assignee is not subject to the equities available against the assignor, he still takes subject to the liabilities of the mortgagee and obviously, the transfer by the mortgagee must be subject to the rights of the mortgagor.<sup>87</sup> Justice Cozens Hardy in the case cited below<sup>88</sup> said:

It is well settled that where mortgage is transferred without the privity of the mortgagor the transferee takes subject to the state of account between the mortgagor and the mortgagee at the date of the transfer: Mathews v Wallwyn <sup>89</sup>

This rule was applied in a case where the mortgagee retained the mortgage money, and undertook to apply it to the payment of debts of the mortgagor. The mortgagee only utilized part of the money for that purpose, and assigned the mortgage to a third person. The mortgagor was obliged to pay the rest of the debts himself, and then sued the mortgagee in damages for the deficit. The suit was decreed against the mortgagee, and as against the transferee who was a party to the proceedings, the court made a declaration that if the mortgagee does not pay the sum which may be due to the mortgagor on account of the money which the mortgagee failed to pay, the mortgage in the hands of the transferee will be good only for the amount paid for the mortgage with interest.<sup>90</sup>

As the transfer is subject to the rights of the mortgagor, it follows that if the mortgage is void, the sub-mortgage is also void. Thus, in an English mortgage when a mortgage was void on account of champerty, the sub-mortgage was also void.<sup>91</sup> However, when a minor obtained a decree setting aside a mortgage by his guardian and did not make the sub-mortgagee a party, it was held that the sub-mortgagee's rights were not affected.<sup>92</sup>

As regards the debt, the mortgagee has been said to be very much in the situation of a surety for the sub-mortgagee, because even if he is unable to recover his debt from the mortgagor, he is liable for what may not be recovered, to the sub-mortgagee, and the sub-mortgagee cannot restrain the mortgagee from recovering the mortgage debt, and at the same time hold him liable for the sub-mortgage debt.<sup>93</sup>

The mortgagee may effect an equitable sub-mortgage by deposit of the mortgage deed.<sup>94</sup>

The rights of redemption and sale in the case of successive mortgages are dealt with in s 94, but the case of a sub-mortgage has been omitted.

Illustrations

If A mortgages to B, and B sub-mortgages to C, then, as between B and C, the rights of redemption and of sale or foreclosure are the same as in a mortgage, B may redeem C and C may foreclose or bring to sale B without making A a party.<sup>95</sup> The subject-matter of this mortgage are the rights of B as existing at the time of the sub-mortgage.

If A sues to redeem B, he must make C a party, for C is interested in the mortgage security as an assignee of B.<sup>96</sup>

If B sues to foreclose or brings to sale A then he, B must make C a party for the same reason.

Again C may foreclose or bring to sale A, and if he does, he must make B a party, for B is interested in the equity of redemption as assignee of A. The authority for this in England is Hobart v Abbot<sup>97</sup> and the form of decree is given in s 12, Chapter 47 of Seton on Decrees. The Indian Form is No 11 of Appendix D of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908.

Narayan Vithal v Ganoji<sup>98</sup> is an instance of a suit for redemption of land which has been sub-mortgaged by the mortgagee. Chief Justice Sir Charles Sargent said:

In the case of a derivative mortgage or sub-mortgage, the judgment directs an account of what is due to the original mortgagee or his assignee, and then of what is due to the derivative or sub-mortgagee; and that upon payment to the latter of the sum due to him, not exceeding the sum found due to the original mortgagee, and on payment of the residue if any, of what is due to the original mortgagee, both of them shall reconvey to the mortgagor.

In a later Bombay case,<sup>99</sup> a suit for redemption of a mortgage which had been sub-mortgaged was rightly dismissed, because the deceased mortgagee's legal representatives had not been made parties. The judgment, however, says that there is no privity between the mortgagor and the sub-mortgagee. This is not correct, for there is privity of estate as they have rights in the same property.<sup>1</sup> The Rangoon High Court has, however, held that the rights given to a sub-mortgagee is in default of payment to sell the interest mortgaged to him and to sell it through the medium of a court. He has no privity of contract or privity of estate with the original mortgagor.<sup>2</sup>

Muthu Vija Raghunatha v Venkatachallam,<sup>3</sup> is an instance of a sub-mortgagee bringing to sale the interest of the mortgagor. This right was admitted by the Allahabad High Court in the Full Bench case of Ram Shankar Lal v Ganesh Prasad.<sup>4</sup> It had been previously denied by the Allahabad High Court<sup>5</sup> owing to the erroneous interpretation put upon the word 'property' as actual physical objects, and not including rights to and in physical objects. Indeed, under this construction there could be no such transaction as a sub-mortgage; but the Allahabad High Court had not carried their doctrine to this extremity, for it had held that when the mortgagee acquired the equity of redemption, such accession enured for the benefit of the sub-mortgagee,<sup>6</sup> and that a sub-mortgagee was entitled to redeem a prior mortgagee.<sup>7</sup>

The nature of a transaction of a sub-mortgage, and the rights of a sub-mortgagee, have been fully reviewed by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court.<sup>8</sup> The court held that a sub-mortgagee had two rights, one based on the personal covenant of the mortgagee, and the other on a derivative title to the mortgage right. These two remedies were alternative, and mutually exclusive; a sub-mortgagee cannot pursue one after he has elected to pursue the other.

Movables

(25) Mortgage of Movable Property

The TP Act, refers to mortgages of immovable property<sup>9</sup>, and the Indian Contract Act 1872 refers to pledges of movable property. But neither Acts deal with mortgages of movable property. A mortgagee of movable property is entitled to a decree for sale, just as much as a mortgagee of immovable property.<sup>10</sup> A mortgagee of movable property, if in possession, has a right to sell the property without the intervention of the court, if after proper notice the mortgagor fails to repay the mortgage money.<sup>11</sup> However, delivery of possession is not necessary to constitute a mortgage of movable property, and a hypothecation of movable property though not accompanied with delivery of possession, is valid and recognized in Indian law.<sup>12</sup> As a transfer of movable property is not complete without delivery of possession, such hypothecations have been described as creating an equitable charge.<sup>13</sup> For the same reason, a mortgage of movables is liable to be defeated if the mortgagor in possession sells the goods to a bona fide purchaser without notice.<sup>14</sup> In some cases, however, it has been held-it is submitted incorrectly-that the mortgage will prevail against a bona fide purchaser without notice.<sup>15</sup> The preference given to the innocent purchaser is sometimes put on the ground of prevention of fraud, and in Narasiah v Venkataramiah,<sup>16</sup> the Madras High Court said:

When goods are left in the possession of the mortgagor, a wide door is left open for fraud, and when the equities between the innocent purchaser and the mortgagee have to be weighed, the preponderance must be given to the purchaser, for the mortgagee has by his omission to secure possession of the goods facilitated the commission of the fraud.

On the same principle, a mortgagee of movables without possession has been postponed to a subsequent mortgagee with possession, and without notice of the first mortgagee.<sup>17</sup> As between two mortgagees of movables both without possession, the mortgagee who came to court first has been given priority on the principle qui prior est tempore potior est jure.<sup>18</sup> As between a mortgagee of movables without possession and a judgment creditor of the mortgagor, it has been held that the judgment creditor does not get priority over such a mortgagee merely by filing his application for attachment, and that if the mortgagee takes possession before actual attachment, the judgment creditor gets no prior rights.<sup>19</sup>

Shares are movable property in Indian law, and may be the subject of a mortgage or a pledge. Whether it is a mortgage or a pledge depends on the nature of the transaction, and the intention of the parties. Where there is a mere deposit of share certificates without any deed of transfer, the transaction is a pledge.<sup>20</sup> However, a deposit of the certificates accompanied by a duly executed blank transfer deed, has been held to be a mortgage,<sup>21</sup> as the transaction clearly authorised the creditor to fill up the blank, and get his name registered.

No particular formality is necessary for the creation of a security on movable property, and a parole mortgage of goods is valid. Order 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to a mortgage of movable property, and so o 34, r 14 does not enable a mortgagee of movable property who has obtained a personal decree for the mortgage money, to sue afterwards on the mortgage.<sup>22</sup>

(26) Mortgage of Movables not in Existence

A mortgage of movable property, which is to come into existence in future, has also been recognized. Such mortgages are equitable assignments fastening on the property when it comes into existence under the rule in Holroyd v Marshall<sup>23</sup> and Collyer v Issacs.<sup>24</sup> Instances of such mortgages are mortgages of future crops,<sup>25</sup> or of indigo cakes to be manufactured,<sup>26</sup> or a future decree,<sup>27</sup> or future dues for work to be done.<sup>28</sup> Such mortgages cannot be enforced against a purchaser for value without notice.<sup>29</sup> It has, however, been held that a mortgage of profits accruing from year to year from immovable property as in profits from a sugar refinery, is not valid as it is neither movable property, nor goods.<sup>30</sup>

(27) Pawn or Pledge of Movables

A pledge is bailment of movable property by way of security. Possession is given, and the transaction involves a transfer of special property in the subject of the security. The distinction between a mortgage and a pledge is explained by Story in his book on Bailments as follows:

A mortgage of goods is at Common Law distinguished from a mere pawn. By a grant or conveyance of goods in gage or mortgage the whole legal title passes conditionally to the mortgagee; and if the goods are not redeemed at the time stipulated, the title becomes absolute at law, although equity will interfere to compel a redemption. But in a pledge a special property only, as we shall presently see, passes to the pledgee the general property remaining in the pledger. There is also another distinction. In the case of a pledge of personal property the right of the pledgee is not consummated except by possession; and ordinarily, when that possession is relinquished, the right of the pledgee is extinguished or waived. But in the case of a mortgagee of personal property the right of property passes by the conveyance to the pledgee and possession is not, or may not, be essential to create or support the title.<sup>31</sup> There can be a mortgage of movables which is different from a pawn. In a mortgage of movables, the remedy by way of redemption would be available to the mortgagor, so also, the remedy of foreclosure to the mortgagee.<sup>32</sup>

A pawnee has no right of foreclosure since he never had absolute ownership at law, and his equitable title cannot exceed what is specifically granted by law. In this sense, a pledge differs from a mortgage.<sup>33</sup>

In a mortgage, there is a conditional transfer of general title, subject to being divested by a subsequent sale by the mortgagor to a bonafide purchaser without notice. In a pledge, the pledgee is in possession and has a special property in the goods which he is entitled to detain to secure repayment. A subsequent pledge will have priority over a previous hypothecation.<sup>34</sup>

(28) Classification

The section enumerates six classes of mortgage:-

1. Simple mortgage.
2. Mortgage by conditional sale.
3. Usufructuary mortgage.
4. English mortgage.
5. Equitable mortgage.
6. Anomalous mortgage.

CLAUSE (B)

(29) Simple Mortgage

A simple mortgage consists of-

- (1) a personal obligation, express or implied, to pay; and

- (2) the transfer of a right to cause the property to be sold.

The right transferred to the mortgagee is not ownership.<sup>35</sup>

(30) Binds himself Personally to Pay

The personal liability to pay may be either express, or implied, for a promise to pay arises out of the acceptance of a loan.<sup>36</sup> However, the personal liability is excluded when the borrower binds himself to pay out of a particular fund.<sup>37</sup> In Ram Narayan Singh v Adhindra Nath<sup>38</sup> Lord Parker gave the following brief, but adequate summary of the law:

- (1) The loan prima facie involves a personal liability;
- (2) Such liability is not displaced by the mere fact that security is given for the repayment of the loan with interest;
- (3) The nature and terms of the security may negate any personal liability on part of the borrower.

It is accordingly, a matter of construction whether the security is a simple mortgage. For a simple mortgage, there must be a personal covenant either express or implied;<sup>39</sup> and in the absence of such a covenant, the security is generally, but not necessarily a charge.<sup>40</sup>

(31) No Possession

The characteristic of a simple mortgage is that possession is not given. If a simple mortgagee sues to enforce his security, a decree for possession would be illegal; and if passed, would not operate as a foreclosure, but would make the simple mortgagee, a mortgagee with possession.<sup>41</sup>

The primary consideration in a suit for sale of the mortgaged property is the debt borrowed, and the mortgage is only by way of security in favour of the mortgagee. There is thus, no legal hurdle in recovering the amount of debt by a simple money decree.<sup>42</sup>

A simple mortgage with possession is a simple mortgage usufructuary, which is not included in the definition of an anomalous mortgage. In the undernoted case,<sup>43</sup> the mortgage was a simple mortgage with a provision that if default was made in payment of interest, the mortgagee should take possession. This was really simple mortgage usufructuary or an anomalous mortgage, though called a simple mortgage in the judgment.

(32) Right to Cause the Property to be Sold

This right as already explained is a right in rem, although it can only be enforced by the intervention of the court.<sup>44</sup> In fact, the very words 'cause the property to be sold' indicate that the power of sale is not to be exercised without the intervention of the court.<sup>45</sup> The transfer of this right may be express,<sup>46</sup> or it may be implied;<sup>47</sup> and in Motiram v Vitai<sup>48</sup> J Nanabhai Haridas said that a power of sale is very seldom expressly given in a native mofussil mortgage. Any words pledging the property as security for the debt are sufficient to imply a right of sale.<sup>49</sup> The word muakiza<sup>50</sup> is not commonly used to denote a simple mortgage; but the words nazar gahan and taran gahan<sup>51</sup> import a power of sale. And so do words like rehan, arh, or mastaghara.<sup>52</sup> In a Madras case,<sup>53</sup> the words 'in default I shall on the security of the house site belonging to me .... pay and make good the principal and interest' were held to constitute a simple mortgage. The Privy Council in Gokuldoss v Kriparam<sup>54</sup> held that the following words sufficed to create a simple mortgage:

if I fail to pay the money as stipulated, I and my heirs, shall without objection cause the settlement of the said village to be made with you.

Where a mortgage deed gives a mortgagor the option of repaying the loan by selling the mortgaged property, that does not exclude the personal covenant in cases where there is one.<sup>55</sup>

In a simple mortgage the security for the debt is, therefore, two fold:

- (1) the personal obligation; and
- (2) the property.<sup>56</sup>

CLAUSE (C)

(33) Mortgage by Conditional Sale

This is a mortgage in which the ostensible sale is conditional, and intended as a security for the debt. In case of payment at the time fixed, the condition was that the sale became void, or that the mortgagee executed a reconveyance. The distinction between a mortgage by conditional sale and a sale with a condition of repurchase has already been explained in the note 'Sale with a condition of retransfer' above.

In a mortgage, the debt subsists and a right to redeem remains with the debtor; but a sale with a condition of repurchase is not a lending and borrowing arrangement; no debt subsists and no right to redeem is reserved by the debtor, but only a personal right to purchase. This personal right can only be enforced strictly according to the terms of the deed, and at the time agreed upon.<sup>57</sup> However, in a mortgage by conditional sale, the right of redemption subsists notwithstanding that the mortgagor has failed to pay at the time stated.<sup>58</sup> This right arises from the fact that the property is considered to be merely a pledge for the loan.<sup>59</sup>

A mortgage by conditional sale was common in India from very early times, and among Hindus it generally took the form of a mortgage which worked itself out in a sale on default of payment. Justice Sadasiva Ayyar, in the undernoted case,<sup>60</sup> suggested that this form of mortgage does not fall within the definition of mortgage by conditional sale in the TP Act. It is submitted, however, that there is no substance in this distinction, for in a mortgage by conditional sale the ostensible sale is really a mortgage, and it does not matter by what name it is called.<sup>61</sup> The Hindu form of mortgage was treated as a mortgage by conditional sale in a Madras case<sup>62</sup> by CJ Sir Charles Turner, a member of the second Indian Law Commission. Again, this form of mortgage was recognized by the Privy Council as standing on the same footing as mortgages by conditional sale in Balkishen v Legge.<sup>63</sup> But the distinction made by J Sadasiva Ayyar, has been followed in some subsequent cases.<sup>64</sup> In, ancient India, there was no equity of redemption in case of default in a mortgage by conditional sale, any more than in an outright sale with a condition of repurchase.<sup>65</sup>

The Rajasthan High Court<sup>66</sup> quoted with approval the decisions of Supreme Court,<sup>67</sup> and observed that if the sale and agreement to re-purchase are embodied in separate documents, then the transaction cannot be a mortgage, irrespective of whether the document are contemporaneously executed. But the converse does not hold good, ie, the mere fact that there is only one document does not necessarily mean that it must be a mortgage, and cannot be a sale. If the condition of repurchase is embodied in the document that effects or purports to effect the sale, then it is a matter of construction which was meant. This change was effected in the TP Act by the amendment in s 58(c). The legislature has made a clear classification, and excluded transactions embodied in more than one document from the category of mortgages. Therefore, it is reasonable to suppose that persons who, after the amendment choose not to use two documents, do not intend the transaction to be a sale, unless they displace that presumption by clear and express words.

(34) Bengal

In Bengal, the Usury Regulations 15 of 1793 and 34 of 1802, required the mortgagee on redemption to give an account of rents and profits, and to credit receipts in excess of legal interest to capital. Bengal Regulation I of 1798 empowered the mortgagor to pay the money into court on the day named. However, none of these Regulations extended the time for redemption, nor did they require any judicial procedure for foreclosure. This was effected by Bengal Regulation 17 of 1806. Under this Regulation, it was necessary for the mortgagee to make an application for foreclosure to the district judge before he could acquire an absolute title (s 8). The mortgagor had a right of redemption on payment or tender of the amount due, or on making a deposit in the court; and this right he could exercise within one year of service upon him of notice of the mortgagee's application for foreclosure. The provisions as to service were imperative and not merely directory;<sup>68</sup> and a notice that did not inform the mortgagor of the different courses open to him invalidated foreclosure proceedings.<sup>69</sup> The mortgagee was not entitled to possession without taking foreclosure proceedings;<sup>70</sup> and if he entered without taking proceedings for foreclosure, the mortgagor could eject him as a mere trespasser.<sup>71</sup> The function of the judge in the proceedings was ministerial,<sup>72</sup> and if the mortgagee did not get possession after foreclosure, he was obliged to file a suit for the purpose.<sup>73</sup> If he neglected to file a suit, the mortgagor remaining in adverse possession for 12 years would acquire a prescriptive title, which could not be displaced by a foreclosure proceeding under the TP Act.<sup>74</sup> The effect of these Regulations was, therefore, to curtail the strict rights of the mortgagee on the analogy of English rules of equity. These Regulations were followed in the United and Central Provinces and Oudh, and in Punjab. They were extended to the Central Provinces by Act 20 of 1875. The Privy Council approved of their being followed in the non-regulation provinces as being in accordance with the rule of equity and good conscience.<sup>75</sup> The TP Act does not affect any right, or any relief in respect of a right, under the repealed Regulation (s 2(c)). So when the mortgagee had given notice of foreclosure under the Regulations, he could not treat the proceedings as a suit filed under the TP Act,<sup>76</sup> nor could he file a fresh suit under the TP Act.<sup>77</sup> On the other hand, if the suit is properly filed under the TP Act, the mortgagor cannot claim the benefit of one year's grace allowed in the repealed Regulation.<sup>78</sup>

Section 37A of the Bengal Money-Lenders Act provides that in the case where any loan is secured by a mortgage, and the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property on any of the conditions specified in sub-s (c) of s 58 of the TP Act, then, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in proviso to the said sub-section, the transaction shall always be deemed to be a mortgage by conditional sale and the mortgagee, a mortgagee by conditional sale for the purpose of the said sub-section, even if the transaction is effected by two separate deeds, viz the ostensible sale deed, and the agreement for reconveyance.<sup>79</sup>

(35) Madras

The term 'Tamil term 1' means a sale, which is to take effect after a particular time limit. A document termed 'Tamil term 2' is an outright sale. The term 'Tamil term 3' is more or less equivalent to 'Tamil term 1'. On the facts, the document in which the consideration was an odd sum was held to be not outright sale, but a sale in the category 'Tamil term 1'. The entire sum paid by the defendant under the document went towards the discharge of loans due by the plaintiff, and there was also evidence to show that the property was worth much more than the sum mentioned in the document, and also that when the plaintiff gave notice calling upon the defendant to accept the sum and to return possession of the property to the plaintiff, the defendant did not protect and also did not send any reply. Hence, the document is only a mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>80</sup>

(36) Bombay

In Bombay, the ancient law was followed and no right of redemption was recognized by the Sadar Adalat in gahan lahan mortgages. However, the change came in 1864 when in Ramji v Chimo,<sup>81</sup> the Bombay High Court approved the leading Madras case,<sup>82</sup> and allowed a right of redemption tempered with an allowance to the mortgagee for improvements effected under the mistaken impression that he had become a purchaser.<sup>83</sup> And in Madras, this course of decisions persisted despite Pattabhiramier's case,<sup>84</sup> and was justified by CJ Westropp after an exhaustive review of the case law in the under-noted case.<sup>85</sup> The Bombay High Court refused to alter this course of decisions even after Thumbusawmy's case,<sup>86</sup> and two years after that case, CJ Westropp in Bapuji v Semavaraji<sup>87</sup> declared that the doctrine known as the equity of redemption was part of the ancient law of India, and this was followed in subsequent cases.<sup>88</sup>

The TP Act, repealed the Regulations and removed the differences between the different high courts; and as to all mortgages executed after it came into force, the right of redemption is given by s 60.

(37) Central Provinces

In Central Provinces (now forming part of Madhya Pradesh) in the case of a gahan lahan mortgage, a court can pass a decree either for foreclosure, or for sale.<sup>89</sup>

(38) Bihar

Where a document of title contained a stipulation that the vendor is entitled to repay the consideration by a certain date and take back the property and if the vendee or his representative refuses to accept the consideration money, the vendor must be entitled to deposit the money in the government treasury, and enter into possession, it was held that the transaction was a mortgage and not a sale.<sup>90</sup>

(39) Kutch

In Kutch, in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale executed before the merger, there would be a right of redemption after the specific term.<sup>91</sup>

(40) Personal Liability

The definition does not mention a personal covenant to repay, and the personal liability is not an essential ingredient of a mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>92</sup> It has been said that this circumstance makes mortgages by conditional sale an exception to the rule 'no debt no mortgage'.<sup>93</sup> It is true that the test of a right of personal recovery applied by CJ Wesropp, in Bapuji v Senavaraji<sup>94</sup> fails because of the absence of a personal covenant. But this test would also fail in the case of usufructuary mortgage,<sup>95</sup> and CJ Westropp, in the case cited applied the maxim 'once a mortgage always a mortgage' to mortgages by conditional sale. It is, therefore, submitted that the debt subsists, although the creditor's right of recovery is limited to the mortgaged property.

(41) On a Certain Date

In a Calcutta case,<sup>96</sup> CJ Maclean, said that 'a certain date' was an essential element of a mortgage by conditional sale. In a later case,<sup>97</sup> it was held by the same high court that 'on a certain date' means 'on or before a certain date.' The Madras High Court, however, has held that these words refer to the default in the second cl of s 58(c), and not to the payment in the third or fourth clause.<sup>98</sup> Same is the Gujarat view.<sup>99</sup>

(42) Clause (c), Proviso

The proviso to cl (c) was added by s 19 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 1929. The proviso was introduced in this clause only to set at rest the controversy about the nature of the document, whether the transaction would be a sale or a mortgage. It has been specifically provided by the amendment that the document would not be treated as a mortgage, unless the condition of repurchase was contained in the same document.<sup>1</sup> The Special Committee, in its Report,<sup>2</sup> stated:

Section 58(c) contains the definition of a mortgage by conditional sale. It is with the greatest difficulty in many cases that such mortgages can be distinguished, from sale with a condition for repurchase. As clause (c) of Section 58 indicates, the real point of difference between the two kinds of transactions is that, in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale, the sale is only ostensible, whereas in the case of an out and out sale, it is real. The ostensible or real nature of transaction can, however, be only determined by finding out the intention of the parties. In order to escape the liability of accounting for the profits of the property and other liabilities imposed on a mortgagee, and also to escape the provisions of some of the local laws enacted for the benefit of agriculturists, creditors resort to the mode of having a mortgage which is in form of an out and out sale. Since the decision of the Privy Council in Balkishan Das v Legge,<sup>3</sup> it has been a well-settled rule that it is not open to Courts to allow any extraneous evidence in order to find out the intention of the parties. Such intention must, therefore, be gathered from the document itself which purports to effect the transaction. These transactions have given rise to a great deal of litigation and Courts are compelled to enumerate and consider all the various criteria which have been laid down for the purpose of determining whether a transaction is a mortgage or an out and out sale. In order to avoid the difficulties indicated above, we think it desirable to lay down a statutory test by which the intention is to be gathered. We, therefore, propose that no transaction should be deemed to be a mortgage by conditional sale unless the condition is embodied in the document which operates or purports to effect the sale.

The effect of the proviso to cl (c) added by the amending Act of 1929 is that if the condition for re-transfer is not embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect a sale, the transaction will not be regarded as a mortgage. This has now been settled by several decisions of the Supreme Court,<sup>4</sup> and this was also the opinion expressed by the high courts in many cases.<sup>5</sup> The effect of the proviso is that a transaction in which the stipulation for reconveyance is contained in a separate document cannot be a mortgage of any kind, both because of the language of the proviso, and because it could not fall in any other category of mortgage.<sup>6</sup>

Where a document purports to be an absolute sale and there is no stipulation for treating the sale as mortgage, a separate document of re-conveyance cannot convert it into a mortgage.<sup>7</sup>

The very object of the proviso to s 58(c) is to shut out an inquiry, irrespective of whether a sale with a stipulation to re-convey is a mortgage, where the stipulation is not embodied in the same document. Hence, if the sale and agreement to repurchase are embodied in separate documents, then the transaction cannot amount to mortgage, irrespective of whether the documents are executed contemporaneously.<sup>8</sup>

A registered sale-deed was executed by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff on 27 August 1952 for Rs 10,000. There was a separate karannama executed by the plaintiff in favour of the defendant to reconvey the property on payment of Rs 10,000 by 6 June 1953. In a suit for possession filed by the plaintiff, it was contended that the transaction was not a sale, but a mortgage. It was held that the fact that possession was deferred will not go against the transaction being a sale, as delivery of possession is not necessarily an integral part of sale. Regarding the sale deed and the karannama, it was clear that there was a complete transfer of title, and vesting thereof in the plaintiff on 27 August 1952. At the same time, there was a contemporaneous agreement between the plaintiff on the one hand and the defendant on the other, of reconveyance of the property.<sup>9</sup>

Illustration

A executed a document, selling certain property to B for a certain sum. On the same day, a contemporaneous document was executed by B in favour of A, agreeing to sell the property in question for the same amount within 10 years of the date of execution of the document by A. The possession of the property remained with A and he was to pay Rs 80/- per month as rent to B. The Municipal and other taxes in respect of the property were to be paid by A. The question was about the real nature of the transaction between A and B. It was held that the transaction in question was, in essence and substance, a mortgage, though it was clothed in the garb of a transaction of ostensible sale.<sup>10</sup>

For a transaction to be a mortgage by conditional sale, proviso to s 58(c) envisages that the condition effecting or purporting to effect the sale as a mortgage transaction, must be incorporated in one and the same deed.

Where separate documents of sale deed, deed of reconveyance and lease deed were executed in the same transaction and the condition effecting the sale as a mortgage was not embodied in the sale deed itself, the mortgagor was debarred from saying that the transaction was in the nature of mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>11</sup>

In a Calcutta case, the plaintiff executed a sale deed in respect of certain immovable property in favour of the defendant. On the same day, an agreement for re-conveyance and a lease of the property in favour of the plaintiff's son were also executed. The plaintiff subsequently brought a suit for relief under Bengal Act (10 of 1940) for a declaration that the transaction was, in fact, a mortgage. The court found that it was not a mortgage, but went on to investigate whether it was a loan, and granted a declaration that it was a loan with a charge.

On appeal, it was held that the court could not do so. The object behind the legislative enactment in the matter of adding a proviso to s 58(c) would be wholly frustrated if it be considered open to a court to make an investigation (as had been done by the lower court), and then to grant a declaration that the transaction, though on the face of it is an outright sale, yet was a loan subject to a charge over the property. Such being the position, the decree as passed was clearly unsustainable in law.<sup>12</sup>

However, it does not follow that if the stipulation for reconveyance is embodied in the same document, the transaction is necessarily a mortgage.<sup>13</sup> In Pandit Chunchun Jha v Sheikh Ebadat Ali,<sup>14</sup> Mr Justice Bose, delivering the judgment of the court, observed:

The Legislature has made a clear-cut classification and excluded transactions embodied in more than one document from the category of mortgages; therefore, it is reasonable to suppose that persons who, after the amendment, choose not to use two documents, do not intend the transaction to be a sale, unless they displace that presumption by clear and express words; and if the conditions of s 58(c) are fulfilled, then we are of opinion that the deed would be construed as a mortgage.<sup>15</sup>

In so far as these observations suggest that in all cases where the whole transaction is in one document, there is a presumption that the transaction is a mortgage, and that such a presumption can only be rebutted by express terms, the observations are, it is respectfully submitted, too wide. Prima facie, such a transaction may be regarded as a mortgage.<sup>16</sup> The Gujarat High Court has held that once the condition of conveyance is incorporated in the document of ostensible sale executed by the owner, the applicability of s 58(c) is not ruled out merely because the ostensible purchaser's promise to reconvey the property after the specified period is contained in a separate document.<sup>17</sup> The Supreme Court in Shyam Singh v Daryao Singh<sup>18</sup> has held that since the sale and agreement of repurchase are contained in two separate documents, although contemporaneously executed, the transaction cannot be treated to be a 'mortgage' as defined in s 58(c) read with proviso thereunder, but it seems to be a transaction akin to a 'mortgage'- if not 'mortgage proper'.

A transaction cannot be deemed to be a mortgage, unless the condition referred to in the clause is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale. However, the converse does not necessarily follow and if the conditions are incorporated in the deed purporting to effect a sale, it does not mean that mortgage is necessarily intended.<sup>19</sup> However, a reasonable inference of mortgage can be drawn from such a clause, and unless the presumption is displaced, the deed is one of mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>20</sup>

However, it would be open to the other side to show that it was intended to be an out and out sale.<sup>21</sup> As the Supreme Court has itself observed in the later case, the question whether, by the incorporation of such a condition, a transaction ostensibly of sale may be regarded as a mortgage is one of intention of the parties, to be gathered from the language of the deed interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances.<sup>22</sup>

It has been held by the Allahabad High Court,<sup>23</sup> that the proviso does not have retrospective effect.

In Punjab, where the TP Act is not in force, a sale deed and a stipulation for reconveyance by a separate document may amount to a mortgage, if the latter is registered, for the rule contained in the proviso has been held not to embody a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.<sup>24</sup>

The period of limitation is 12 years from the date when the money sued for becomes due.<sup>25</sup>

CLAUSE (D)

(44) Usufructuary Mortgage

In a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagee is placed in possession and has a right to enjoy the rents and profits until the debt is paid. It is not necessary that the mortgagee should take physical possession, for the mortgagor may continue in possession as lessee of the mortgagee,<sup>26</sup> or he may direct the tenants to pay rent to the mortgagee,<sup>27</sup> but unless there is a clause providing for the mortgagee going in possession, there cannot of course, be a usufructuary mortgage.<sup>28</sup> As possession by the mortgagee is the distinguishing feature of such a mortgage, it follows that there cannot be two different usufructuary mortgages on the same property at the same time.<sup>29</sup> When a mortgage was executed and the property mortgaged was leased to the mortgagee, both formed one transaction which was a usufructuary mortgage, and not a simple mortgage.<sup>30</sup> A lekha mukhi mortgage in Punjab is a usufructuary mortgagee.<sup>31</sup>

Where a mortgage is void by virtue of breach of s 165, MP Land Revenue Code, possession has to be given back to mortgagor. Parties must return benefits received to each other, by virtue of s 65, Indian Contract Act 1872 where an agreement becomes void, or is discovered to be void.<sup>32</sup>

The expression 'usufructuary mortgage' as understood in the context of the TP Act, does not apply to the said expression as used in s 12 of the Bihar Money Lenders Act 1975.<sup>33</sup>

The words 'expressly or by implication binds himself to deliver possession' were inserted by the amending Act of 1929. The fact that possession was not given cannot alter the character of the transaction,<sup>34</sup> and the words now inserted make it clear that the mortgagee who is entitled to possession under the mortgage, but who has not received possession, is a usufructuary mortgagee. There is nothing illegal in a usufructuary mortgagee leasing the property to the mortgagor. The mere fact that at the time of the execution of the mortgage it was agreed that the mortgagor would continue in possession as a lessee, would not affect the latter's legal position.<sup>35</sup>

The document introducing any conditions other than those covered by s 58(d) could not be regarded as usufructuary mortgage. Thus, where the document fixed the time to enjoy property for a term of 25 years on illidarwar rights; created a personal covenant to pay value of improvements as decided by four respectable persons, and after the period of 25 years or when the mortgagee demanded mortgage money, payment of not only the mortgage money, but also the value of improvements were agreed as the terms of the document, it was held that the document cannot be regarded as usufructuary mortgage.<sup>36</sup>

Where a usufructuary mortgagee leases the property back to the mortgagor, whether the relationship between them is that of landlord and tenant would depend upon the construction of the deed. If it is, the mortgagee may evict the mortgagor for non-payment of rent.<sup>37</sup> A Full Bench of the Karnataka High Court while answering the question whether an usufructuary mortgagee is a landlord for purposes of part II of the Karnataka Rent Control Act 1961 in the affirmative, held that since delivery of possession is a necessary concomitant of a usufructuary mortgage and since the concomitant entitles the usufructuary mortgagee to claim possession of the property to the exclusion of all others, including the mortgagor, the mortgagee is for all intents and purposes the owner himself, as he steps into the shoes of the owner, and by reason of it he acquires the status of a landlord under s 3(h) as well as the provisions of part II for claiming possession of mortgaged premises for his personal use.<sup>38</sup> The Supreme Court has found itself in agreement with the view of the Full Bench.<sup>39</sup>

A usufructuary mortgage of an occupancy holding was not valid as a mortgage with all its incidents and subject, to the provisions of law relating to usufructuary mortgage, but was valid only in a qualified sense, ie, in the sense of subletting with a covenant that the mortgagor will not be entitled to recover possession without payment of the mortgage money, and further, that under such a mortgage there is no transfer of the right of an occupancy tenant and consequently no suit for redemption was maintainable, nor was there any extinguishment of the right of an occupancy tenant upon expiry of the period of limitation fixed for redemption under art 148 of the Limitation Act 1908.<sup>40</sup>

A mortgagor executed a usufructuary in respect of his agricultural rent. Since no rent in respect of the land was paid to the landlord, he instituted a suit for arrears of rent and obtained a decree and on an execution thereof, the property was put to sale. The mortgagee paid the decretal amount. It was held that if on some default in payments of rent, a rent decree is obtained and the mortgagee pays the sum even then the mortgage in question is liable to be redeemed at the option of the mortgagor. The mortgagor cannot escape from his obligations by bringing the equity of redemption of sale in execution of a decree on the personal covenant.<sup>41</sup>

(45) Appropriation of Rents and Profits

The manner of appropriation of rents and profits depends upon the terms of the deed. The definition has been widened by the addition of the words 'or any part of such rents and profits.' This would cover cases where the mortgagee is put in possession and retains part of the rents and profits in discharge of the debt, and pays the residue as rent to the mortgagor. Thus, in a Madras case<sup>42</sup> the plaintiff in return for a loan of Rs 1,400 put the defendant in possession of premises of a rental value of Rs 16-12-0 per mensem. The defendant retained Rs 14 towards principal and interest, and paid the plaintiff Rs 2-12-0 as rent.

The rents and profits or part of the rents and profits may be appropriated

- (1) in lieu of interest;
- (2) in lieu of principal; or
- (3) in lieu of principal and interest.

The first case resembles the Welsh mortgage, and is the most common form where the borrower practically says to the creditor: 'you lend the money and I lend the land; if either of us wants that which he has lent, he shall restore that which was lent to him.'<sup>43</sup> The mortgagor recovers possession when he pays the principal and there is no question of an account between the mortgagor and mortgagee (s 77).

In the first case, the mortgagee takes the chance of the rents and profits being greater or less than the interest.<sup>44</sup>

In the second case, the mortgagor continues to pay interest, and is entitled to recover possession when the rent and profits received was equal to the amount of the principal. An account of the rents and profits is necessary for this purpose.

In the third case, the mortgagor is not entitled to recover possession until the principal and interest are paid out of the rents and profits. This is a common form and an account is necessary to ascertain whether the principal and interest have been paid off. There are cases, however, in which the condition is that the rents and profits are taken in lieu of interest and defined portions of the principal (s 77).

Thus, if the condition is that the rents and profits each year shall be taken in lieu of interest and one-tenth of the principal, the debt is discharged in 10 years, and no account is necessary.

The characteristics of a usufructuary mortgage as defined in this section are:

- (1) there is no personal liability on the mortgagor;
- (2) no time limit is fixed;
- (3) the mortgagee takes the whole or part of the rent and profits.<sup>45</sup>

(46) No Personal Liability

The mortgagee takes possession, and looks to the rent and profits to repay himself. The mortgagor cannot be sued personally for the debt.<sup>46</sup>

In a Calcutta case,<sup>47</sup> the words were 'having paid the principal money in the month of Chaitra 1297 we shall take back the documents and the land. In case we fail to repay the principal money at due date, the sudbharna bond shall remain in force.' But they were held to import no personal covenant. As there is no personal liability, a debt secured by a usufructuary mortgage cannot be attached under o 21, r 46 of the Code of Civil Procedure as if it were a simple debt.<sup>48</sup> The interest of such a mortgagee can only be attached under o 21, r 54.

This characteristic is lacking in many mortgages that are commonly called usufructuary. A personal covenant is often included in order to provide a personal remedy against the mortgagor. If the covenant does not import a right of sale, it has been said that the character of the mortgage is not altered,<sup>49</sup> but it is submitted that it is an anomalous mortgage. If it does import a right of sale, it would still be an anomalous mortgage since the amending Act of 1929, but a simple mortgage usufructuary under the TP Act as it stood before the amendment.

As s 58(d) stands, if under the mortgage deed, a mortgagor expressly or by implication binds himself to convey possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, the transaction is a usufructuary mortgage, notwithstanding the fact that the actual possession has not been delivered. Such a transaction being a usufructuary mortgage, s 67 does not empower the mortgagee to bring the property to sale. Section 68 may confer a right on the mortgagee to sue for the mortgage money when the mortgagor fails to deliver the property to him without disturbance by the mortgagor or any person claiming under him. This does not expressly or by implication confer a right on him to recover the mortgage money by the sale of the property.<sup>50</sup>

(47) No Time Limit

The mortgagee retains possession until the mortgage money is paid. It has been held that this is an uncertain time dependent on the state of the account or the ability of the mortgagor to repay, and that if a time limit is fixed the mortgage is not a mortgage 'until payment of the mortgage money' and is, therefore, not a usufructuary mortgage.<sup>51</sup> But this view does not seem to be correct. A time limit may be impliedly fixed when the agreement is that referred to in s 77, when the rent and profits are in lieu of interest and defined portion of the principal. In Ram Narayan Singh v Adhindra Nath<sup>52</sup> a fixed date was appointed for restoration of possession after calculation of the time when the mortgage money would be discharged out of the usufruct, yet the Privy Council held that it was only a usufructuary mortgage. Again s 62(b) expressly provides for a case where a term is prescribed for the payment of the mortgage money. However, if the time limit imports a personal covenant to pay and a right of sale in default, the mortgage would not be a usufructuary mortgage, but an anomalous mortgage of the species 'simple mortgage usufructuary'.<sup>53</sup> If at the expiry of the time limit the mortgage is to become a mortgage by conditional sale, it is an anomalous mortgage of the species 'mortgage usufructuary by conditional sale'.<sup>54</sup>

(48) Usury Regulations

Usufructuary mortgages were a cloak for usurious transactions, the rent being taken in lieu of exorbitant interest. The Usury Regulations<sup>55</sup> were designed to check this practice by limiting the mortgagee to interest at 12 per cent and by making him liable to account for rents and profits, notwithstanding the terms of the contract, and allowing redemption before the expiry of the period fixed in the deed.<sup>56</sup> Usufructuary mortgages executed while these regulations were in force are controlled by them, even though the suit be filed under the TP Act.<sup>57</sup> Thus, in one case redemption was allowed before the expiry of the period fixed.<sup>58</sup> But in a case where the contract was not usurious, the Privy Council held that a condition exonerating the mortgagee from filing accounts was valid, although it was governed by the regulations.<sup>59</sup>

(49) Possession of property, recovery of<sup>60</sup>

Possession of the mortgagee is permissive in character in the sense that it is with the consent of the mortgagor.<sup>61</sup> Therefore, on redemption of mortgagee, the mortgagee is required to hand over the possession of the property to the mortgagor. There are, however, certain exceptions to it. In case of the mortgagee, a tenant of the mortgagor prior to the mortgage, it is a general principle of law that there is no automatic merger of the tenancy rights with the mortgage rights. Both of them operate independent of each other, and on redemption of the mortgage, tenancy would revive except in a case where an intention of the parties is reflected to the contrary.<sup>62</sup> The effect of the mortgage is to keep the lessee's rights in abeyance which stood revived upon the redemption of mortgage.<sup>63</sup> For a merger to arise, it is necessary that a lesser estate and a higher estate should merge in one person at one and the same time and in the same right, and no interest in the property should remain outside. In the case of a lease, the estate that is in the lessor, is a reversion. In the case of a mortgage, the estate that is outstanding, is the equity of redemption of the mortagagor. Therefore, there cannot be a merger of lease and mortgage in respect of the same property since neither of them is a higher, or a lessor estate than the other.<sup>64</sup> Since there is no automatic merger, in absence of proof of surrender of lease by the mortgagee/lessee, the mortagagor/lessor is not automatically entitled to recover possession of leased premises on redemption of mortgage.<sup>65</sup> However, if the mortgagee had no tenancy rights prior to mortgage, he cannot claim the same after mortgage ends.<sup>66</sup>

As regards tenants inducted by the mortgagee, the Supreme Court has held that he may grant lease not extending beyond the period of the mortgage; any leases granted by him must come to an end at redemption<sup>67</sup> since it is not an act of prudent management.<sup>68</sup> They can be evicted on redemption of mortgage.<sup>69</sup> Such tenants are not entitled to the protection of rent control legislation against the mortgagor after the redemption of the mortgage.<sup>70</sup> An agricultural lease may confer at best the status of tenants from year to year.<sup>71</sup>

(50) Zuripeshgi and Similar Leases

Zuripeshgi leases bear a close resemblance to usufructuary mortgages, but are not mortgages, unless the lease is for the purpose of securing a debt. The word zuripeshgi means lease for a premium-the premium being the original loan. Mortgages were given in this form in order to evade the prohibition against usury in the Koran, and in the Usury Regulations. The usual form of such a mortgage was a loan repayable on the day the lease should expire, and the rent is either wholly the interest, or partly the interest, and partly repayment of the principal with a proviso that the lessee shall continue in possession till the loan should be repaid.<sup>72</sup> Once you get a debt with the security of land for its repayment, then the arrangement is a mortgage by whatever name it is called.<sup>73</sup> Where, however, a lease does not intend to create the relationship of debtor and creditor and reserves no right of redemption to the lessor, but simply asks the lessee to quit the land without any payment on the part of the lessor at the expiry of the term of the lease, it is zuripeshgi lease, and not mortgage.<sup>74</sup> The Privy Council in the Bengal Indigo Company v Mohunt Roghubur Das<sup>75</sup> described the possession of the lessees under a zuripeshgi lease as being 'in part at least, not that of cultivators only, but that of creditors operating repayment of the debt due to them by means of their security.' The case of Venkateshwara v Kesava<sup>76</sup> is a good illustration of such a transaction. The plaintiff borrowed Rs 1,400 from the defendant, and leased him a piece of land and a warehouse for eight years. It was agreed that the rent of the warehouse should be Rs 16-12-0 per mensem, and that the defendant should retain Rs 14 as interest on the advance and pay Rs 2-12-0 as rent to the plaintiff. The warehouse was destroyed by fire after four years; the defendant ceased to pay Rs 2-12-0 as rent, and the plaintiff sued to recover possession for non-payment of rent. The suit was dismissed on the ground that the defendant was entitled to possession as mortgagee. Justice Innes said:

The gist of the agreement was not a letting of the premises with a rent reserved, but a usufructuary mortgage of the premises with a certain small portion of its income made payable to the plaintiff.

As the lease is security for the loan, it has been held that zuripeshgi leases are construed as mortgages, when there is a right of redemption expressly or impliedly reserved.<sup>77</sup> In Maharaja Kesho Prasad v Chandrika Prasad,<sup>78</sup> CJ Dawson Miller:

I think the result of the authorities as well as of the textbooks is that the test in such cases must be whether there is a secured debt and a right of redemption.

In a mortgage by zuripeshgi lease for a fixed term, a personal covenant to repay is implied.<sup>79</sup> If the lease is not security for the loan, the transaction would not be a mortgage, but a lease and an ordinary money debt.<sup>80</sup> If the original premium is not an advance which is repayable, the transaction is a lease, and not a mortgage.<sup>81</sup>

The Supreme Court has approved<sup>82</sup> the above discussion in the fourth edition of this work, and set out the following tests to ascertain whether the transaction is a lease or a mortgage:

- (1) Is there an express term which makes the loan returnable either by repayment, or by enjoyment of the usufruct;
- (2) Is interest fixed;
- (3) Is the right of redemption granted;
- (4) Is there any provision for personal liability if any amount remains outstanding after the term of the lease.

These tests, have been applied in several cases.<sup>83</sup>

It cannot, of course, be a mortgage where the mortgagee is entitled to remain in possession even after the discharge of the entire amount advanced.<sup>84</sup>

In a mortgage by zuripeshgi lease, the lease and the mortgage may or may not be separable transactions, and it is purely a question of construction whether the remedies can be separately pursued.<sup>85</sup> The undernoted cases<sup>86</sup> are examples of combined lease and mortgage. The lease was of a coal mine and the mortgage was of the leasehold premises to secure an advance made by the lessee to the lessor, and the mortgagee-lessee also had the right to appropriate the royalties to the discharge of the principal money secured by the mortgage. These were separate transactions, and the mortgaged property was sold subject to the lease. In a Punjab case,<sup>87</sup> where the lease was merely a means of realising the interest of the mortgage which was executed the same day, a suit for rent was held to bar a subsequent suit for recovery of the principal and interest under o 2, r 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In a zuripeshgi lease, the mortgagee is the lessee and has physical possession. However, a usufructuary mortgagee may lease the mortgaged property to the mortgagor and put him in physical possession. In such cases, the lease and mortgage are distinct.<sup>88</sup>

A mortgagee with possession is entitled to be in possession of the mortgaged property as long as it is not redeemed. If the mortgagee with possession leases back the property to the mortgagor, he acquires the right of a lessor, and is entitled to enforce the terms of lease against the mortgagor.<sup>89</sup>

The distinction between a usufructuary mortgage and a kanam-kuzhikanam, a transaction common in the south, was considered by the Supreme Court in Lakshmi v Narayani.<sup>90</sup> The court held that the question must be resolved by considering the transaction as a whole to determine whether the purpose of the transaction was the enjoyment of the property, or whether it was intended to secure repayment of a debt; the description in the document was immaterial. This was reiterated by the Supreme Court in Mangala v Puthiyaveethil.<sup>91</sup> The court in the latter case emphasised the quantum of money paid and the proportion it bore to the value of the property; if it was a substantial proportion of the value, the transaction would be a mortgage.

Some of the guidelines for deciding whether a transaction is a lease or a mortgage are, that the name given to the document is not conclusive. The question has to be decided with reference to the predominant intention of the parties as gathered from the recitals and the terms in the entire document, and the surrounding circumstances, including the conduct of the parties. Further, while, in the case of a mortgage, there is a transfer of interest in the property to secure repayment of a debt, in the case of a lease it is transfer of a right to enjoy the property. In the instant case, the property was the premises of a shop. The transferee was to be in possession, and was to carry on his business therein, but with no power to lease it out. No rate of interest was fixed in the document and there was no mention of how the money said to have been lent should be realised if the transferor, for some reason, could not remain in possession. Nor was there any clause that if possession was not re-delivered at the end of the period, the transferor had the right to redeem the property. The transferee was a dealer in liquor, and was having business in the premises. On earlier two occasions, the non-residential premises had been given to the transferee. Considering all the above facts, it was held that the predominant intention of the parties was not to secure the repayment of debt. Taking into account the conduct of the parties as evidenced by the earlier deals, the transaction was held to be a lease, and the transferor's suit for 'redemption' of the alleged self-redeeming mortgage was dismissed.<sup>92</sup>

(51) English Mortgage

In an English mortgage, as defined in s 58(e), there is, in form, a transfer of ownership to the mortgagee, with a covenant to repay the debt on a certain date, and a proviso that on this condition being performed the mortgagee will retransfer the property to the mortgagor. Options as regards earlier payment or extension of time for repayment are matters of grace, which do not affect the undertaking to repay at a certain date.<sup>93</sup> In Narayana v Venkataramana<sup>94</sup> the Madras High Court said:

The three essentials of an English mortgage are

- (1) That the mortgagor should bind himself to repay the mortgage money on a certain day;
- (2) That the property mortgaged should be transferred absolutely to the mortgagee;
- (3) That such absolute transfer should be made subject to a proviso that the mortgagee will reconvey the property to the mortgagor, upon payment by him of the mortgage money, on the day on which the mortgagor bound himself to repay the same.

The question arises whether this requirement that the property should be transferred absolutely is a mere matter of form, or is a matter of substance so that the whole of the interest of the mortgagor must pass to the mortgagee. The word 'absolutely' in the definition of an English mortgage in cl (e) seems inconsistent with the general definition in cl (a) that 'a mortgage is a transfer of an interest' in the property. If a mortgage is a transfer of an interest in property, it is not an absolute transfer. Chief Justice Rankin in Bengal National Bank v Janaki Nath Roy,<sup>95</sup> suggested that cl (e) and cl (a) might be reconciled, that the estate vests absolutely in the mortgagee, and that the assignment is not less absolute because the mortgagee is under a covenant to reconvey. It was accordingly held that a mortgage by a lessee by way of an English mortgage operated as an absolute assignment of the lease and established privity of estate between the assignee and the lessor, so as to entitle the lessor to claim rent from the assignee. The reasoning of the learned Chief Justice was, however, doubted in a later Calcutta case<sup>96</sup> where with reference to this inconsistency J Mukerji said:

The definition of an English mortgage as given in the Transfer of Property Act s 58(e) must be read subject to the definition of a mortgage as given in clause (a) of that section, and consequently, an English mortgage in India can hardly be regarded as the transfer of the entire estate of the mortgagor to the mortgagee. It is correct, however, not to regard what is left in the mortgage as an equitable estate, but it is nevertheless some estate; an interest only in the estate having been transferred under the mortgage. In our opinion, therefore, it is not easy to say of an assignment by way of an English mortgage in India executed by a lessee that the whole of the estate passes under the mortgage to the mortgagee.

The reasoning adopted by J Mukerji found favour with the Judicial Committee in Ramkinkar v Satyacharan<sup>97</sup> where the nature of an English mortgage as defined in s 58(e) has been clearly explained.

The question as to whether the deed is a deed of mortgage by conditional sale, or a deed of English mortgage, is one of the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Where the transaction under the deed was a English mortgage, a decree for foreclosure was incompetent under s 67. However, in the instant case, the mortgagee-plaintiff had filed a suit for foreclosure and a final decree was passed in it, and the same cannot be set aside, keeping intact the preliminary decree for foreclosure against which no appeal was preferred by mortgager/appellant. When this was of English mortgage, the mortgagee had a right to apply for passing decree for sale of mortgaged property.<sup>98</sup>

In Ramkinkar v Satyacharan,<sup>99</sup> the question that was ultimately raised was whether a lessor could sue a mortgagee from a lessee for rent. This he could do if there was a privity of estate between him and the mortgagee. There could be privity of estate between the lessor and the mortgagee if the mortgage operated as an absolute assignment of the lease by the lessee to the mortgagee.

The question was answered as follows:

The Indian mortgagor, however, retains some rights, though the English rules of equity do not apply. He retains a right to a reconveyance of the land and a right to transfer such right by way of sale or second mortgage (ss 81, 82, 91 and 94), and this right in India is a legal right.

The interest which remains in the mortgagor, being thus a legal interest, its retention will, therefore, prevent the whole of the mortgagor's interest from passing to the mortgagee. The correctness of this position is also indicated by the fact that s 54 which deals with sale speaks of a sale as a transfer of ownership as opposed to the transfer of interest spoken of in s 58(a) in the case of a mortgage. The word 'interest', it is pointed out, is, when used in opposition to ownership, more appropriate to a limited right. The question arises as to what is the nature of this legal right. Whether it is a mere contractual right to have the property reconveyed. If it is, then under s 54 such contractual right does not create any interest in the property, and the mortgagor cannot possibly assign his right of redemption or create a second mortgage so as to bind the property. However, ss 81, 82, 91 and 94 recognise second mortgagor. It follows, therefore, that the right of a mortgagor in India is more than a mere contractual right, and must be a legal right in the property itself. If it is a legal right in the property which remains with the mortgagor, it clearly follows that the mortgagor has not parted with the whole of his rights. The issue, therefore, is to reconcile this position with the language of s 58(e) which speaks of absolute transfer of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee.

Referring to that section, their Lordships observed:

In using those words, does it mean that no interest or no legal interest in the property remains in the mortgagor? Their Lordships cannot think so. If the sub-section stopped at the word 'mortgagee' it might be necessary to put this construction upon it, but it did not stop there: it adds the proviso that the mortgagee 'will transfer' the property 'upon payment of the mortgage money as agreed'.

Their Lordships observed that with this addition, the sub-section upon its true construction does not declare 'an English mortgage' to be an absolute transfer of the property. It declares only that such a mortgage would be absolute were it not for the proviso for transfer. It does not determine what legal effect follows from the use of a particular form of words; it merely prescribes the form of words necessary to constitute what is known in India as an English mortgage. Section 58(e) deals with form, not substance. The substantial rights are dealt with in ss 58(a) and 60. Whatever form is used, nothing more than an interest is transferred, and that interest is subject to the right of redemption.

In India, the distinction exists between the position before and after the date of payment. Before that date, the mortgagor has an interest in the land which for the reasons given above is legal, and not equitable. After that date, he has the legal right of redemption given to him by s 60 of TP Act. In each case, he retains a legal interest in the property. Their Lordships, therefore, held that in India a mortgagor when he assigns his interest under a lease to a mortgagee does not under any of the forms specified in s 58 of the TP Act, transfer an absolute interest and consequently, the mortgagee is not liable by privity of estate for the burdens of the lease.

In Jagadamba Loan Co Ltd v Raja Shiba Prosad<sup>1</sup> the Judicial Committee reiterated and applied the above principles, and held that the fact that the mortgagee had not entered into possession did not make any difference. In the light of these two decisions, the earlier Indian cases should be read where it has been held that in Indian law as well, the right of redemption remaining in the mortgagor is an estate in land.<sup>2</sup> In Indian law, the right to redemption is conferred by s 60 of TP Act.

One of the essentials of English mortgage is that the mortgagor has to bind himself to pay the mortgage-money on a certain date. Thus, where the repayment was to be made within a period of eight years, which originally was five years, it was held that this did not constitute a binding obligation to repay the debt on a certain date.<sup>3</sup>

(52) English Mortgage-Personal Debt

Such a mortgage includes a personal covenant to which is generally annexed a power of sale in s 69. The mortgagee acquires the right to take possession as soon as the mortgage is executed, irrespective of whether a right of entry is expressly covenanted for.<sup>4</sup>

In order to avoid the liability to account on the footing of wilful default, an English mortgage usually provides for the appointment of a receiver by the mortgagee on behalf of the mortgagor, so that the receiver is agent of the mortgagor, and possession remains with the mortgagor.<sup>5</sup>

When one of the terms of a mortgage was that the mortgagor should execute an irrevocable power of attorney authorizing the mortgagee to collect the rents, either by one's ownself or by a substitute, on behalf of the mortgagor, this provision was held to be equivalent to placing a receiver in possession as agent of the mortgagor. It had not the effect of delivering possession to the mortgagee, or of converting the mortgage into a usufructuary mortgage, or of making the mortgagee liable to account for more than the sums actually received by him.<sup>6</sup>

CLAUSE (F)

(53) Mortgage by Deposit of Title Deeds

This is called in English law an equitable mortgage. It is the well established rule of equity that mere deposit of a document of title without writing or without word of mouth, will create in equity a charge upon the property referred to. The term 'equitable mortgage' is not appropriate in India, for the law of India knows nothing of the distinction between legal and equitable estates.<sup>7</sup> However, the phrases 'equitable mortgage' and 'equity of redemption' are commonly used in Indian courts. The phrase 'equity of redemption' is not, in view of the two decisions of the Judicial Committee mentioned above, less appropriate than the phrase 'right of redemption.' The phrase 'equitable mortgage' might have been formerly justified in India on the ground that it was an inchoate mortgage perfected by equity. Equitable mortgages or mortgages by deposit of title deeds were accepted in India as equivalent to simple mortgages after the Privy Council decision in Varden Seth v Luckpathy,<sup>8</sup> and this is still the case in districts to which the TP Act has not been extended.<sup>9</sup> The TP Act recognizes such mortgages as equivalent to simple mortgages-s 96-but restricts their operation to certain centers of commerce. This has been done as a matter of convenience to the mercantile community to enable them to borrow money without the delay of investigation of title, and the publicity of registration. Such mortgages are, however, at variance with the policy of publicity of transfer underlying TP Act and the Registration Act 1908. The Privy Council in Imperial Bank of India v U Rai Gyaw Thu,<sup>10</sup> held that although there was no formal conveyance, an equitable mortgage effected a transfer of an interest in property, and for purposes of priority stood on the same footing as a mortgage by deed. A proviso to this effect has been added to s 48 of the Registration Act by the amending Act 21 of 1929.

A delivery of documents of title alone is sufficient to create equitable mortgage under the section. There is no necessity to execute any document.

(54) Territorial Restrictions

Equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds is permissible in Simla in view of the notification dated 22 May 1976.<sup>11</sup>

Where a deposit takes place, it has to be ascertained in the usual way; so where a debtor handed over the deeds to the assistant of the common attorney of the debtor and creditor outside Calcutta,<sup>12</sup> or where a debtor posted the deeds at a place not notified to the creditor under the latter's express instruction,<sup>13</sup> it was held that the transaction was complete outside a notified town, and s 58(f) did not apply. However, what constitutes the transaction is delivery with the intention of creating a security. So in a case where physical delivery takes place outside the notified town, but the intention to create an equitable mortgage is formed after the deeds are in one of the above towns, the Supreme Court applied the section.<sup>14</sup>

Territorial restriction referred to in s 58(f) has reference only to the delivery of the documents of title, and not to the situation of the property mortgaged. Once the mortgage is created in a notified town, the registration of the memorandum can be either at the town where the equitable mortgage is created, or in the office of the sub-registrar within whose jurisdiction, the mortgaged property is situated. As long as the memorandum merely confirms an equitable mortgage already created in a notified town, the registration of the memorandum even outside the notified towns, will be valid.<sup>15</sup>

(55) Requisites of a Mortgage by Deposit of Title Deeds

The requisites of an equitable mortgage are:

- (1) a debt;
- (2) a deposit of title deeds; and
- (3) an intention that the deeds shall be security for the debt.<sup>16</sup>

The above three requisites (debt, deposit, and intention to create security) have been reiterated in a Calcutta case.<sup>17</sup>

(1) Debt :

The debt may be an existing debt, or a future debt. The use of the word 'debt' as one of the requisites of a mortgage by the deposit of title deeds in this work, as well as in several leading decisions, does not, it is submitted, preclude such a mortgage being created to secure future advances or contingent pecuniary liabilities. Any transfer of an interest in property to secure the payment of money, advanced or to be advanced, or an existing or future debt, or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability, is a mortgage- s 58(1); and sub-s (f), which defines an equitable mortgage, merely prescribes one of the modes of creating a mortgage.<sup>18</sup> Deposit of title deeds with banks to secure an overdraft account-which involves both existing and future advances-are common; and have been upheld as falling within sub-s (f);<sup>19</sup> and also a mortgage to secure a general balance due on an account;<sup>20</sup> similar transactions securing guarantees or indemnities are also common and would, it is submitted, be also so upheld. Nor does the use of the word 'creditor' in the sub-section make any difference, for the word can mean a person having a future or contingent claim.<sup>21</sup>

(2) Deposit of title deeds:

It has been held in England that it is sufficient if the deeds deposited bona fide relate to the property or are material evidence of title, and that it is not necessary that all the deeds should be deposited.<sup>22</sup> These cases have been followed in India.<sup>23</sup> But CJ Page in a Full Bench decision of the Rangoon High Court<sup>24</sup> held that the documents must not only relate to the property, but must also be as to show a prima facie or apparent title in the depositor. If the deeds are lost, copies may be deposited.<sup>25</sup> If the deposit is accompanied by a memorandum in writing, the written bargain determines what is the scope and extent of the security, otherwise the scope of the security is the scope of the title.<sup>26</sup> If a share of an indigo concern is mortgaged, it is sufficient to deposit the title deeds under which the share was acquired and if the mortgagee's sale takes place at some subsequent date, the share will pass at the date of sale, ie, not only what is called accession, but changes in good will, rights under contract, and so forth.<sup>27</sup>

Illustration

A had purchased two plots of leasehold land. A's title deed was the sale deed of both plots and two leases, one of each plot, on each of which was an endorsement showing that A was the purchaser. A made a mortgage by deposit of the sale-deed and one lease with B. 16 months later A made a mortgage by deposit of the other lease with C. B's mortgage was a valid mortgage of both plots and C's mortgage was a valid mortgage of one plot, but B's mortgage being earlier had priority.<sup>28</sup>

Physical delivery of documents is not the only mode of deposit, and constructive delivery is sufficient.<sup>29</sup> The Supreme Court in KL Nathan v SV Maruty Ready,<sup>30</sup> observed that:

it would be hypertechnical to insist upon the formality of the creditor delivering the title-deeds to the debtor and the debtor re-delivering them to the creditor.

If the documents deposited show no kind of title, no mortgage is created.<sup>31</sup> A tax receipt and a plan are not documents of title, and their deposit does not create a mortgage.<sup>32</sup> A deposit of an expired lease creates a mortgage of the leasehold when the mortgagor obtains a renewal of the lease.<sup>33</sup> It has been said that a patta of land in the mofussil is usually a document of title;<sup>34</sup> but this would depend upon the circumstances under which it was issued.<sup>35</sup> A mortgage is not a deed of title for the mortgagor, for it only shows that the mortgagor has dealt with the property as his.<sup>36</sup> However, a mortgage is a document of title of the mortgagee, and a mortgagee can effect an equitable sub-mortgage by deposit of his mortgage deed.<sup>37</sup>

When the documents deposited along with the memorandum of deposit, though not complete in themselves for holding the title, were undoubtedly documents relating to the property, and prima facie showing title to the same, they constitute 'documents of title' within the meaning of s 58(f) according to a Madras case. In this case, the documents were:

- (1) the hundi towards the purchase price;

- (2) the agreement by the previous owner of the site to convey the property; and
- (3) tax receipt in the name of the plaintiff's father.<sup>38</sup>

A copy is not a document of title, and its deposit cannot be an equitable title. It is only an evidence of title. However, where the original is lost, a certified copy made with safeguards can be received as document of title. However, it must be made out that the original is lost.<sup>39</sup>

Where the mortgagor who was one of the donees of the properties gifted to various persons, did not possess the original title deed, the deposit of registration copy of the title deed, tax receipts and a certificate issued by the president of the Panchayat with an unequivocal intention to create an equitable mortgage was held to be sufficient to create such mortgage.<sup>40</sup>

Where the original title deed is lost, an equitable mortgage can still be created. The mortgagee in such cases has only to be vigilant in accepting such representation made to him and should make necessary inquiries before agreeing to advance monies on the basis of registration, extracts of documents of title, or copies of documents. That is the principle underlying s 78, which provides that if the conduct of prior mortgagee amounted to gross neglect, the mortgage in his favour will be postponed to the subsequent mortgage.<sup>41</sup>

In order to create a valid equitable mortgage, it is not necessary:

- (a) that all the documents of title to the property should be deposited; or
- (b) that the documents deposited should show a complete or good title.

It is sufficient if the deeds deposited bona fide relate to the property, or are material evidence of title, and are shown to have been deposited with the intention of creating a security thereon.<sup>42</sup> However, no mortgage is created if the mortgagee fails to prove that title deeds were ever deposited even though a letter in proof of deposit of title deed is executed.<sup>43</sup>

(3) Intention to create security:

The intention that the title deeds shall be security for the debt is the essence of the transaction. In Heng Moh v Urn Saw Yean,<sup>44</sup> the managing partner admitted that he had received title deeds from the other partner in the capacity of a manager, and the Privy Council held that the delivery of the deeds was a mere partnership transaction, and did not give the managing partner the rights of an equitable mortgagee. Whether the requisite intention exists is a question of fact in each case, and is to be ascertained after considering oral, documentary, and circumstantial evidence. The mere fact of a deposit does not raise the presumption that such an intention existed,<sup>45</sup> and the fact that at the time of making the deposit the parties intended to execute a mortgage deed does not negative an intention to create an equitable mortgage till such a deed is executed. And even the distinction made in English law between an antecedent and a subsequent debt has been described by the Supreme court as only a guide.<sup>46</sup>

Such an intention cannot, as already stated, be presumed from possession, for mere possession of the deeds is not enough without evidence as to the manner in which the possession originated so that a contract may be inferred.<sup>47</sup> In Jethibai v Putlibai,<sup>48</sup> it was said that mere possession of title deeds by the creditors, coupled with the existence of a debt, does not necessarily lead to the presumption of a mortgage, that may be so when the title deeds are produced by the creditor after the lapse of many years without explanation.

Although the fact that the documents were coming from the custody of the plaintiff is not, by itself, sufficient to prove an intent to create a security, that fact is significant, and unless the defendants satisfactorily explain how the documents came in the plaintiff's custody, this fact would have a great bearing.<sup>49</sup> According to the High Court of Andhra Pradesh, where there are structures on a land, then the equitable mortgage should extend to the land and structures even though the deeds deposited relate to the land only.<sup>50</sup>

If it is in contemplation of parties to have a legal mortgage prepared and if the title deeds are deposited for that purpose only, the deposit does not create an equitable mortgage.<sup>51</sup> In Jaitha Bhima v Haji Abdul,<sup>52</sup> the deeds were delivered for the preparation of a legal mortgage; the legal mortgage was prepared and executed, but was not registered; and the creditor then contended that he had abandoned the idea of taking a legal mortgage, and claimed as mortgagee by deposit of title deeds. This plea was disallowed, for the court found that there was no antecedent debt at the time of the delivery of the deed, and that the creditor would not have advanced the money if the debtor had not been ready to execute the deed.

If an additional amount is advanced to the mortgagor on the understanding that the mortgagee will be entitled to retain the documents as security for the additional amount also, the agreement is treated as a constructive delivery of the title deeds to the creditor, as security for further advances.<sup>53</sup>

(56) Registration

A mortgage by deposit of title deeds does not require any writing,<sup>54</sup> and being an oral transaction it is not affected by the law of registration. But it is usual for the deposit to be accompanied by a memorandum in writing.<sup>55</sup> If this writing is the contract of mortgage so that it creates the mortgage it must be registered-and oral evidence to contradict it is not admissible.<sup>56</sup> However, registration is not necessary if the mortgage is complete without the writing and the writing is merely a statement that the mortgage has been effected, or a statement of facts from which the contract of mortgage can be inferred. In Obia Sundarachariar v Narayanna Ayyar,<sup>57</sup> the memorandum was merely a list of the deeds deposited, and it did not need registration, although it was deposited before the money was advanced. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee said-

No such memorandum can be within the section unless on its facts it embodies such terms and is signed and delivered at such time and place and in such circumstances as to lead legitimately to the conclusion that so far as the deposit is concerned, it constitutes the agreement between the parties.

The necessity for registration, therefore, depends upon the construction of the memorandum in the light of the surrounding circumstances,<sup>58</sup> and if it is loosely worded the distinction is very fine. To illustrate this is the leading case of Kedarnath Dutt v Shamloll Khettry.<sup>59</sup> In that case, Shankerlal had advanced Rs 1,200 to the borrower who deposited the title deeds, and executed the promissory note for the amount. On the promissory note he made the following endorsement: 'For the repayment of the loan of Rs 1,200 and the interest due thereon on the written note of hand, I hereby deposit with Shamloll Khettry, as a collateral security by way of equitable mortgage, title deeds of my property.'

Sir Richard Couch in giving judgment pointed out that if there had been no endorsement at all on the promissory note, there would have been a complete equitable mortgage, and that the endorsement was merely a recital of the fact of the deposit from which the contract of mortgage is inferred so that though the writing was not registered, there was a valid equitable mortgage. This case may be contrasted with Bhairab Chandra v Anath Nath De.<sup>60</sup> The defendant had mortgaged his house to the plaintiff and had delivered his title deeds to him for the purpose of that mortgage. He then took a fresh advance of Rs 1,500, executed a promissory note for that amount, and on the sale date sent the plaintiff a letter in these terms: 'For the payment of the sum of Rs 1,500 with interest I have borrowed from you a promissory note of date, I hereby put it on record that the title deeds in my premises already deposited with you shall be held by you as collateral security.' It was held that the letter constituted the mortgage contract, and that it was inadmissible for want of registration. The distinction between the two cases lies in the fact that in Kedarnath's case, the loan and deposit were completed irrespective of the endorsement, while in Bhairab Chandra's case there was no completed contract of mortgage before the letter passed, and it was by the letter that the deeds were made security for the fresh loan.

In Rachpal Maharaj v Bhagwandas Daruka<sup>61</sup> J Patanjali Sastri (as he then was), has stated the law thus:

The crucial question is: did the parties intend to reduce the bargain regarding the deposit of title deeds to the form of a document? If so, the document requires registration. If, on the other hand, its proper construction and the surrounding circumstances lead to the conclusion that the parties did not intend to do so, then, there being no express bargain, the contract to create the mortgage arises by implication of the law from the deposit itself with the requisite intention, and the document itself, being merely evidential does not require registration.

Where the letter did not set out the amount borrowed or the rate of interest, and did not even mention the details of the title deeds deposited, the Supreme Court held that it was merely evidential.<sup>62</sup> It is only when the parties intend to reduce their bargain regarding the deposit of title deeds to the form of a document, that the document requires registration. If proper construction of the document and the surrounding circumstances lead to the conclusion that the parties did not intend to do so, then the contract to create the mortgage arises by implication of the law from the deposit itself (if made with the requisite intention). The document is merely evidential, and does not require registration.

On the facts, it was held that the deposit of title deeds made by referring to the 'promissory note already executed earlier' did not make the memorandum the sole document evidencing the terms of the bargain. The memorandum only confirmed the execution of the promissory note. The memorandum and the promissory note could not, therefore, be considered as integral parts of one transaction, but on the other hand, the deposit was made more than two months after the execution of the promissory note. The mere statement that a deposit is made by way of security for the repayment of the loan cannot be read as a contract which is arrived at by the document itself. Hence, the document cannot be read as recording an agreement between the parties to create a mortgage by deposit of title deeds. It is at best an evidence of the fact that the title deeds had been deposited with the plaintiff.<sup>63</sup>

In case a document was executed for the purpose of creating of mortgage under s 58 (f) of the TP Act, no doubt it requires registration. Similarly, when the memorandum or letter was executed on the date of the deposit or delivery of the title deeds, that needs registration. And after the delivery of the title deeds, if any letter or memorandum was executed endorsing the earlier deposit of title which already created a mortgage, the letter needs no registration.<sup>64</sup> In a Karnataka case, since the title deed delivered was not original and only a certified copy, the memorandum of deposit of title deed was executed and registered. Since the memorandum was denied, the court, in view of s 68 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 held that the bank ought to have examined one of the attestors of the document. Failure to do so led to dismissal of the suit.<sup>65</sup>

In all cases in which a deposit is made by a letter which explains why the deeds are deposited, the letter must be registered, for there is nothing but the letter to connect the deposit with the debt.<sup>66</sup> In some cases,<sup>67</sup> registration was held to be necessary, and in other cases<sup>68</sup> registration was held to be not necessary.

(57) Limitation for Suit on Mortgage by Deposit of Title Deeds

The period of limitation is 13 years as per art 62 of the Limitation Act 1963.

(58) Transfer of Equitable Mortgage

The transfer of an equitable mortgage falls under s 54, and requires a registered instrument.<sup>69</sup>

CLAUSE (G)

(59) Anomalous Mortgages

Under the definition inserted as cl (f) of s 58, it is a mortgage which does not fall within any of the other five classes enumerated. The definition, therefore, includes simple mortgages, usufructuary mortgages, and mortgages usufructuary by conditional sale, in the term 'anomalous mortgage'. Even before the amendment, these combination of the simple forms were sometimes described as anomalous mortgages.<sup>70</sup>

Anomalous mortgages take innumerable forms moulded either by custom or the caprice of the creditor-some are combinations of the simple forms, others are customary mortgages prevalent in particular districts, and to these special incidents are attached by local usage. Such are the kanom, otti, and peruartham mortgages of Madras, and the san mortgage of Gujarat.<sup>71</sup>

A document styled as a possessory mortgage was held to be in effect anomalous mortgage, the mortgagee having been given the right to realise the mortgage money by bringing the right, title, and interest of the mortgagor to sale.<sup>72</sup>

(60) Simple Mortgage Usufructuary

This is now one class of anomalous mortgage, and it is a combination of a simple mortgage, and a usufructuary mortgage. The mortgagee is in possession and pays himself the debt out of the rents and profits, and there is also a personal covenant with an express or implied right of sale. The property is only collaterally pledged as in the case of a simple mortgage, but the mortgagee is given the usufruct of it either by allowing him to take the rents and profits, or by giving him a lease for a fixed period. Instances of such mortgages are the cases cited below.<sup>73</sup> The Bombay case of Amarchand v Killa Morar<sup>74</sup> is a typical simple mortgage usufructuary. The mortgagee was put in possession and authorized to retain possession till payment of the mortgage money; there was a personal covenant to pay, and an agreement that the debt was recoverable from the mortgaged land and from the mortgagor personally. This was wrongly described in the judgment as an anomalous mortgage,<sup>75</sup> though under the TP Act it is an anomalous mortgage. In a simple mortgage usufructuary, the mortgagee may sue for sale though merely as an usufructuary mortgagee, he could not have done so.<sup>76</sup> A mortgage which is neither purely simple, nor usufructuary exclusively, but a mixture of the two, is an anomalous mortgage, within the meaning of s 58(g). The mortgage stipulated that, in the event of failure on the part of the mortgagor within the specified period of time, it shall be open to the mortgagee to make realisation of the same by sale of the property mortgaged. This was a characteristic feature of a simple mortgage. And yet, the mortgage was not purely simple, as under the mortgage deed, the mortgagee was given constructive (if not actual) possession over certain shops, with the right to realise the rent thereof from the respective tenants. It was further provided that the mortgagee shall be entitled to be in possession over certain lands. These terms gave the features of a usufructuary mortgage. Hence, it was an anomalous mortgage.<sup>77</sup> The case of Narsingh Partab v Mohammad Yaqub<sup>78</sup> is an instance of a simple mortgage usufructuary, and the Privy Council held that its character as such was not affected by the fact that the mortgagor had reserved the right to act as manager, and to enhance rents of the property given into the possession of the mortgagee. If the mortgagee is entitled to recover any part of the mortgage money personally from the mortgagor in a usufructuary mortgage, it would become an anomalous mortgage.<sup>79</sup>

It has been said that the right of sale is not to be implied merely from the personal covenant to repay.<sup>80</sup> But usually, the personal covenant is held to have this effect.<sup>81</sup> In Jag Sahu v Ram Sakhi<sup>82</sup> the court quoted with approval the following passage from the judgment in a Calcutta case:<sup>83</sup>

It is well settled that where an instrument of mortgage gives a right to possession and also contains a covenant to pay, thus presenting a combination of an usufructuary and a simple mortgage, the two rights are independent and the mortgagee may sue for sale although he may have given up possession, and the right, accrues immediately after the due date is passed.

Again, a simple mortgage usufructuary may be primarily a simple mortgage with a right to take possession in case of default superadded. In such a case, a suit for sale is always permissible.<sup>84</sup> However, the application of s 67 or 68 is not excluded.<sup>85</sup> In Deputy Commr of Rae Barelli v Lal Rampal Singh<sup>86</sup> there was a mortgage of a village for a sum payable within a certain period by instalments with a provision that the mortgagee should take possession in default of payment, but the last clause of the deed was as follows:

Should on the expiration of the term of this instrument any money remain due, then, till payment thereof, possession will continue according to the terms herein set out. If I do not accept this then as soon as the breach of promise occurs, they will at the end of the year realize the whole amount of instalment by sale of the villages.

The Privy Council construed the document as a whole as a simple mortgage usufructuary, the mortgagee having an absolute right to take possession, and to sell if the mortgagor objected to the application of the rents, and profits to reduction of interest.

In Jawahir Singh v Someshwar<sup>87</sup> there was a mortgage with possession and

- (1) a stipulation for interest and the appropriation of the usufruct to the interest; and
- (2) a clause that if the rent and profits do not cover the interest, the mortgagor would make good the deficiency out of his own pocket.

The Privy Council held that under the later clause, the mortgagor was personally liable to the mortgagee for the principal and the interest.

In Panaganti Ramarayanimgar v Maharaja of Venkatagiri,<sup>88</sup> the mortgage was with possession with covenants to pay both principal and interest, and there was a contemporaneous lease of the mortgaged property for a rent equivalent to the interest, and the lease made the rent a charge on the property. The Privy Council construed the mortgage and lease as one transaction of anomalous mortgage of the type simple mortgage usufructuary, and held that the assignee of the equity of redemption was entitled to a decree for redemption of both the mortgage and the charge.

(61) Mortgage Usufructuary by Conditional Sale

This is another composite mortgage which is now classed as anomalous. The mortgagee is in possession as usufructuary mortgagee for a fixed period and if the debt is not discharged at the expiry of that period, he is a mortgagee by conditional sale.<sup>89</sup> He has, therefore, a right of foreclosure. A typical instance is a Madras case<sup>90</sup> where the mortgage was with possession, the usufruct to be set-off against interest and the principal to be repaid in five years and if not paid, the mortgage was to work out into a sale at the expiry of 20 years. The Privy Council case of Abid Husain v Kaniz Fatima<sup>91</sup> is another instance, for there, a usufructuary mortgage was consolidated with a subsequent mortgage by conditional sale. Sita Nath v Thakurdas<sup>92</sup> was also a case of a usufructuary mortgage for a fixed period with profits in lieu of interest, with a condition that if the principal was not paid at the end of the period, the mortgagee was to have a right to foreclosure.

In some cases, an usufructuary mortgage has a time limit and a condition that in default of redemption the property shall be sold for the amount then due. In such a case, the stipulation for sale is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>93</sup> However, before the Privy Council decision in Mahommad Sher Khan v Seth Swami Dayal,<sup>94</sup> that the doctrine of clog on the equity of redemption shall be applied to all mortgages, such mortgages were sometimes wrongly classed as anomalous. Thus, in a Madras case<sup>95</sup> the terms of the mortgage were as follows:

Within these limits, a house site together with a thatched house thereon we have mortgaged -- that is, we have kept it as a possessory mortgage and have received Rs 10 from you. So, having paid the principal and interest pertaining to these 10 rupees within the end of a year from the said date, we shall take possession of our house and site. If we do not act according to the said condition we shall quit the land and the house as if this is a sale.

This was construed as an anomalous mortgage, but it is clear that it was an usufructuary mortgage, and that the condition as to sale was void as a clog on redemption. This was so held in another very similar case.<sup>96</sup> Where the terms of mortgage deed stated that the amount secured was to be redeemed within a stipulated period, the provision therein, that upon failure to redeem within the stipulated time, the mortgage shall be treated as a sale, would not have the effect of converting the mortgage from usufructuary to an anomalous one. In such a case, when there was no condition in the mortgage-deed that on expiry of stipulated period, the mortgage shall be deemed to be redeemed in full without payment whatsoever by the mortgagor, as required by s 165(b) of Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, the mortgage could not be considered to be valid. The possession of the property mortgaged has to be given back to the mortgagor, under the aforesaid provisions. As the mortgage was void, the parties were liable to return to each other the benefits earned under the contract in view of s 65 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.<sup>97</sup>

(62) Customary Mortgages

Customary mortgages are mortgages to which special incidents are attached by local usage. Thus, otti and kanom mortgages cannot be redeemed before the expiry of 12 years in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary.<sup>98</sup> The otti-holder has a right of pre-emption.<sup>99</sup> The kanom partakes of the character of a mortgage and a lease.<sup>1</sup> Apemartham mortgage is redeemable for the market value of the land at the time of redemption.<sup>2</sup>

(63) Other Anomalous Mortgages

Other anomalous mortgages are very varied. Some are usufructuary mortgages with a covenant to pay,<sup>3</sup> or with a time limit but which do not fall within the class of simple mortgage; usufructuary because neither the covenant, nor the time limit imports a right of sale. Instances of such mortgages are a mortgage with possession for three years, where the land is to be redeemed without payment at the expiry of that period,<sup>4</sup> or a mortgage with possession for four years, where the mortgagee is to credit the rents and profits first to the interest, and then the balance, if any, towards the principal, and the mortgagor is to pay the deficiency at the end of the term,<sup>5</sup> or a mortgage with possession for 10 years with the rent and profits to be in lieu of the principal and interest and the mortgagee's right is to cease at the end of the term,<sup>6</sup> or a simple mortgage repayable in three years' time, but with a condition giving the mortgagee power of foreclosure at any time if a creditor brought a suit against the mortgagor, or attempted to attach his property,<sup>7</sup> or to obtain proprietary possession of the mortgaged property by bringing a suit for a decree of foreclosure.<sup>8</sup>

Other instances of anomalous mortgages are a mortgage where possession was only partly given and there was no personal covenant to pay;<sup>9</sup> and a mortgage which combines the elements of a simple mortgage, a usufructuary mortgage, and a mortgage by conditional sale.<sup>10</sup> In the case last cited, there was a mortgage for three years; wherein, in default of redemption at the end of the term, the mortgagee was to be in possession for four years, and to take the rents and profits in lieu of interest; in default of redemption at the end of four years, the mortgage was to work itself out into a sale. In a Rangoon case,<sup>11</sup> a mortgage with a covenant to pay interest but no covenant to pay the principal, was treated as an anomalous mortgage. It is submitted, however, that the covenant to pay interest implied a covenant to pay principal. But the report does not disclose the terms of the deed. In another anomalous mortgage,<sup>12</sup> the mortgagee was to have possession and appropriate rents and profits towards the satisfaction of a certain rate of interest; the mortgagor was to redeem within eight years and in default, the mortgagee was to have the right to recover the total amount through the court by the sale of the property mortgaged, and by sale of the other property of the mortgagor.

Mortgage when to be by assurance

--Where the principal money secured is one hundred rupees or upwards, a mortgage other than a mortgage by deposit of title deeds can be effected only by a registered instrument signed by the mortgagor and attested by at least two witnesses.

Where the principal money secured is less than one hundred rupees, a mortgage may be effected either by a registered instrument signed and attested as aforesaid, or (except in the case of a simple mortgage) by delivery of the property.

(1) Amendments

The words 'other than a mortgage by deposit of title deeds' were inserted by the amending Act 20 of 1929. The amendment makes no change in the law.

(2) Extent of Applicability

The section does not apply to territories excluded from the operation of the Registration Act 1908. It has been extended to cantonments by s 2 of the Cantonments Act 1924. If, however, the property mortgaged is situated in an area to which the Act has not been extended, the section does not apply even if the contract may have taken place in such an area.<sup>14</sup> An oral mortgage, even if the money secured exceeds Rs 100, is valid where the Act does not apply. Hence, a mortgage that was effected before s 59 was made applicable to the state of Haryana was valid. Limitation for redemption of such a mortgage is 30 years from the date of mortgage under art 61 of Limitation Act.<sup>15</sup>

This section has been extended to the states of Punjab, and Haryana, with effect from 6 June 1968 and 5 August 1967, respectively.

It has been held that the section does not embody a rule of justice, equity and good conscience and does not affect a mortgage executed before the section was enacted,<sup>16</sup> or at a place where the section was not in force.<sup>17</sup>

As a result of the extension of this section to the states of Haryana and Punjab, mortgages other than mortgages by deposit of title deeds can only be made by following the manner prescribed by the section. Mortgages by deposit of title deeds are not, however, affected. Such mortgages would be governed in Punjab by the rules of justice, equity and good conscience. In Haryana, however, s 58(f) has also been extended with effect from 10 May 1972, and some towns notified, so that such mortgages can only be made if the deposit is made in the said towns.<sup>18</sup>

(3) Mode of Transfer

Besides deposit of title deeds, there are only two ways in which property may be transferred by way of mortgage, and these are:

- (1) Registered instrument; and
- (2) delivery of possession.

As in the case of sales, the first overlaps the second, for a mortgage for less than Rs 100 may also be made by registered instrument. If the principal money secured is less than Rs 100, a mortgage may be made by delivery of possession. But of course, this would not apply to a simple mortgage, for in such a mortgage, the mortgagor does not part with possession. A simple mortgage must always be registered.<sup>19</sup> An oral mortgage effected by delivery of possession is entitled to precedence over a subsequently registered mortgage.<sup>20</sup>

Even an admission of a mortgage will not be sufficient to create a mortgage.<sup>21</sup>

Where a mortgage was created against a principal amount of Rs 200 taken as loan, the mortgage deed was unregistered and unstamped, it was held that there was no valid mortgage, as s 59 of the TP Act clearly lays down that where the principal money accrued is Rs 100 or upwards, a mortgage, other than a mortgage by deposit of title deeds, can be affected only by a registered instrument signed by the mortgagor and attested by at least two witnesses.<sup>22</sup>

(4) Transfer when Complete

In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the completion of the mortgage does not depend upon the payment of consideration. The transfer takes effect on the execution of the deed of mortgage,<sup>23</sup> or where there is no deed, when possession is delivered.

(5) Principal Money Secured

These words show that interest is not to be taken into account in estimating the amount secured,<sup>24</sup> as is also the rule under the Registration Act 1908.

(6) Registered Instrument

In the case of a mortgage other than a mortgage by deposit of title deeds, if the principal money secured is Rs 100 or upwards, a registered instrument is necessary. The deeds must be--

- (1) signed by the mortgagor;
- (2) attested by at least two witnesses;
- (3) registered.

Signed by the mortgagor

The section does not expressly empower the mortgagor to sign by an agent as s 123 empowers a donor, but this is implied.<sup>25</sup> The signature may be made by means of types or by a facsimile,<sup>26</sup> or, it may be a mark of an illiterate person.<sup>27</sup> But a literate person cannot sign by making a mark.<sup>28</sup>

Attested

That requisition as to attestation was first made by TP Act.<sup>29</sup> It is now clear that the requisition applies to anomalous mortgages, and this was so decided<sup>30</sup> before anomalous mortgages were included in the definition in s 58.

The requirement of attestation does not, of course, apply to instruments executed by courts.<sup>31</sup>

The definition includes attestation on admission of execution, and is retrospective.

The word 'attested' is defined in s 3 of the TP Act, and the question as to what constitutes a valid attestation is discussed in the note 'Attested' under s 3.

The mode of proving an attested document is laid down by ss 68 to 71 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872. If execution of the instrument is denied specifically, it is necessary to call at least one attesting witness if there be one alive and subject to the process of the court. But even if execution is admitted, it is still incumbent on the plaintiff to prove the mortgage in the form prescribed by s 59, ie, he must prove that it was attested by at least two witnesses.<sup>32</sup> In a case from Patna, a purdahnashin lady admitted execution of a deed of mortgage, and the Patna High Court relying on s 70 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 held the deed proved, although the attesting witnesses were on the other side of the purdah, and did not actually see her sign.<sup>33</sup> But the Privy Council reversed the decision saying that s 70 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 only applied to a document that was duly attested, and that as the mortgage deed was not attested within the meaning of s 59 of the TP Act, it was invalid as against her in spite of her admission.<sup>34</sup> It does not matter that the unattested deed has been put in without objection in the lower court, for s 59 enacts a rule of law, and not a rule of evidence;<sup>35</sup> but if the objection involves a question of facts it cannot be raised in second appeal.<sup>36</sup>

If attestation is invalid the deed cannot operate as a mortgage. Nor can it operate as a charge, for the words in s 100 'and the transaction does not amount to a mortgage' do not mean that a transaction which purports to be a mortgage becomes, by reason of defective execution a charge.<sup>37</sup> However, the invalidly attested deed is admissible as evidence to prove the personal covenant to pay,<sup>38</sup> and if there is no personal covenant, the obligee may sue for compensation or pursue his remedy under s 68 of the TP Act, for the Privy Council said that 'the position of the mortgagor under this section cannot, by reason of the non-attestation of the deed, be better than it would have been if the mortgage had been duly attested'.<sup>39</sup> So, where the deed was unattested, the mortgagor in his suit for redemption was allowed to amend the plaint, and sue on his title.<sup>40</sup> However, if the deed is validly attested it cannot be proved except by the strict mode of proof required by s 68 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, and in default of such proof it cannot be used even as evidence of the personal obligation.<sup>41</sup>

Registration

Prior to the TP Act, a mortgage was not required to be in writing, and usufructuary mortgages in the mofussil were generally made without writing by simple delivery of possession.<sup>42</sup> The Act as originally enacted made registration compulsory for all mortgages of Rs 100 and over, but as to mortgages for less than Rs 100, allowed either an instrument registered, or unregistered, or an oral transfer by delivery of possession where the mortgage was not a simple mortgage. This corresponded with the provisions for optional registration in the Registration Act 1877. And under both Acts interest was not calculated in computing the value of the security.<sup>43</sup> A simple mortgage for less than Rs 100 could be made by an unregistered instrument.<sup>44</sup>

The word 'registered' was inserted in the second clause of s 59 by Act 6 of 1904, which came into force on 11 March 1904. The amendment was made because the rule of priority of registered over unregistered instruments enacted in s 48 of the Registration Act had been construed by the courts as subject to the doctrine of notice. This doctrine had been expressly abolished as regards the early registration regulations by Act I of 1843, but the courts treated it as revived, as subsequent Registration Act did not expressly exclude it.<sup>45</sup> The legislature considered that the application of the doctrine of notice opened the door to perjuries and other malpractices, and virtually abolished it by requiring all deeds of mortgage to be registered. The Amending Act 6 of 1904 thus abolished optional registration as regards mortgage deed, and the competition between registered and unregistered deeds under s 50 of the Registration Act cannot arise in respect of instruments of mortgage executed after 11 March 1904. Such competition may, however, still arise in places where the TP Act is not in force. In Punjab, a mortgage for less than Rs 100 could, before s 59 was extended, be made by unregistered instrument. The Lahore High Court had held that a subsequent registered mortgagee loses priority over a previous unregistered mortgagee if he receives notice of it before registration of his mortgage, even though he had no notice of it at the time of execution.<sup>46</sup>

An oral mortgage is invalid where it is alleged to be a usufructuary mortgage for Rs 450.<sup>47</sup>

In Sikkim, the TP Act does not apply ex proprio vigore, and the provision in s 59 requiring a mortgage of the value of Rs 100 or upwards to be effected by a registered instrument cannot be regarded as an embodiment of the rules of equity, justice, and good conscience. As regards the law of registration in Sikkim, though a document of sale or mortgage of immovable property would be compulsorily registrable under notification no 385/G dated 11 April 1928 and the rules relating to transfer of immovable property dated 18 January 1950, yet, under notification no 2947/G dated 22 November 1946, an unregistered document may be validated and admitted as evidence in a court of law to prove the title or other matters contained in the document on payment of a penalty upto 50 times the usual registration fees.<sup>48</sup>

(7) Registration Must be Valid

The registration must be valid according to the law in force in India (s 3). Thus, if the property is so incorrectly described that it cannot be identified,<sup>49</sup> or when the registration has proceeded on a misdescription which is a fraud on the law of registration;<sup>50</sup> or when the deed is registered in a circle in which the property is not situated,<sup>51</sup> or an infinitesimal property not really intended to be transferred is inserted in the deed only for the purpose of creating jurisdiction in the registration district where the properties really intended to be transferred are situated,<sup>52</sup> or is not presented for registration by the proper person,<sup>53</sup> the mortgage is invalid. When both a sale deed and an agreement to reconvey are executed with the intention that the transaction should be a mortgage, both the deeds must be registered.<sup>54</sup>

(8) Registration, if Invalid

A mortgage deed invalid for want of registration cannot operate as a charge,<sup>55</sup> but it would be admissible in evidence for a collateral purpose to prove the nature and character of the possession under the Privy Council ruling in Varatha Filial v Jeevarathammal.<sup>56</sup> Following this ruling, it has been held that a plaintiff may sue on title for possession after he had executed a usufructuary mortgage which was invalid for want of registration,<sup>57</sup> or use the unregistered deed to defeat the defendant's claim to title by adverse possession.<sup>58</sup> In an Allahabad case,<sup>59</sup> a defendant who had been 12 years in possession under a usufructuary mortgage which was invalid for want of registration was held to have acquired a legally operative mortgage by adverse possession. Under s 53A and the proviso to s 49 of the Registration Act 1908, a mortgage invalid for want of registration is available to a usufructuary mortgagee to protect his possession. A mortgagor cannot file a suit for redemption in the case of a mortgage which is invalid for want of registration. If the mortgage is usufructuary, the proper course is to treat the mortgagee as a trespasser, and to sue for eviction.<sup>60</sup>

Again an unregistered mortgage deed, though invalid as a mortgage may be used to prove the debt. It has been held that if the personal covenant to pay is separable from the creation of the security, it may be used to support a personal claim for the debt;<sup>61</sup> but not if the transaction is indivisible and if the loan and the mortgage cannot be separated.<sup>62</sup> Two Madras cases to the contrary are, it is submitted, unsound. In the first,<sup>63</sup> the mortgage bond was not admitted even as evidence on an express contract to pay contained in the deed, and in the other<sup>64</sup> it was not admitted even as evidence of a stipulation to pay compound interest. However, an oral usufructuary mortgage for a sum over Rs 100 is void, and no suit for the redemption of such a mortgage, and the recovery of possession can lie.<sup>65</sup>

(9) Effect of Registration

A mortgage does not become complete and enforceable until it is registered. Therefore, if a mortgage is impeached as a fraudulent preference, the time of three months under s 54 of the Provincial Insolvency Act runs from the date of registration.<sup>66</sup> But registration does not suspend the operation of the mortgage and under s 47 of the Registration Act, as soon as it is registered it takes effect from the date of execution. Therefore, if the property is attached after the date of execution of a mortgage, but before the date of registration, the mortgage will not be invalid as against claims enforceable under the attachment.<sup>67</sup> This is because an attachment does not affect a subsequent alienation.

When the mortgage and the terms of the mortgage are admitted in the pleading, it has been held that a suit for redemption will lie even though the deed is not registered.<sup>68</sup> On the other hand, if a person suing to enforce a claim arising out of a mortgage admits that the deed of mortgage has been altered by a subsequent verbal arrangement, he can neither prove the verbal arrangement, nor succeed on the footing that the transaction is governed by the mortgage.<sup>69</sup> If the mortgagee remains in possession of the mortgaged property for 12 years on the basis of a usufructuary mortgage deed which is not registered, the mortgagee prescribes to himself for a valid mortgagee's title; he does not acquire full title to the property.<sup>70</sup>

(10) Movables

The section has no application to a mortgage of movable property. A mortgage of movable property does not require registration or attestation.<sup>71</sup>

References to mortgagors and mortgagees to include persons deriving title from them

--Unless otherwise expressly provided, references in this Chapter to mortgagors and mortgagees shall be deemed to include references to persons deriving title from them respectively.

This section was inserted by the amending Act 20 of 1929 to make it clear that the words 'mortgagor' and 'mortgage' include all persons deriving title under them. These words were so used even before the amendment.<sup>72</sup> Even ignoring the amendment brought about by s 59A, the general position is that in the absence of any strong contra indication, a mortgagee would include the assignee of a mortgagee. Thus, the term mortgagee as contained in explanation IV to s 2 (25) of the Kerala Land Reforms Act, was held to include the assignee mortgagee as well, subject of course, to his satisfying other conditions indicated in that provision.<sup>73</sup>

The Privy Council in Muhammad Sidiq v Muhammad Nasirullah,<sup>74</sup> treated the words as including the heirs of mortgagor, and of the mortgagee. The word 'mortgagor', however, does not include a transferee of the mortgagor in s 68(a), as the transferee of the mortgagor is not bound by the mortgagor's personal covenant.<sup>75</sup> This is shown by the words 'mortgagor himself' used in that section. However, in cl (c) of that section, a subsequent purchaser would be included.<sup>76</sup> The section refers to such persons as heirs, executors, and administrators who derive their title from a mortgagor or a mortgagee.<sup>77</sup> A recital in a mortgage deed regarding the payment of consideration is, therefore, held binding on a subsequent purchase of the mortgagor or his representative in title to the extent to which it was binding on the mortgagor himself.<sup>78</sup>

A person who has purchased the right of redemption from the original mortgagor by a registered document, can claim that any question relating to the right of redemption in a suit for redemption must be determined by the court. The plaintiff in such a suit is entitled to demonstrate how the suit is not premature, as the minimum period of non-redemption provided in the mortgage deed is a clog on the equity of redemption and is, therefore, void.<sup>79</sup>

In a Madras case, the auction purchasers purchased one-third share of the mortgagor in mortgaged items of properties, despite their having been made aware of the subsistence of the mortgage. Later on, when some of the purchasers instituted a partition suit, they as well as the other auction purchaser were put on notice of the subsistence of the mortgage, and were warned of the consequences of any collusive arrangement. Despite the notices, the litigant purchasers brought about a compromise partition decree. In this decree, the mortgaged items of properties were allotted to the other parties and some other items of properties (which, according to the mortgagee, were worthless) were allotted to the mortgagors. These materials were held to establish the commission of fraud by the mortgagors and the purchasers. It was held that in such circumstances, the normally available right of the co-sharers of asking for a partition of the mortgaged items free of mortgage, cannot be claimed by such purchasers. The resultant position would be that the mortgagee would be entitled to ignore the partition decree, and to enforce the mortgage against the one-third share of the mortgagor.<sup>80</sup>

For the purposes of s 59A, the transfer may be a voluntary, or an involuntary transfer such as a court sale.<sup>81</sup>

A charge holder cannot be equated with a purchaser of mortgage-security. In a charge there is no transfer of any interest in the property, but only creation of a right of payment out of the property specified. Therefore, a subsequent charge-holder in respect of a mortgaged property is not 'a person deriving title from' the mortgagor within the meaning of s 59A so as to be liable to be sued in a suit for enforcement of the mortgage-security.<sup>82</sup>

Right of mortgagor to redeem

--At any time after the principal money has become due, the mortgagor has a right, on payment or tender, at a proper time and place, of the mortgagor-money to require the mortgagee (a) to deliver to the mortgagor the mortgage-deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee, (b) where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor, and (c) at the cost of the mortgagor either to re-transfer the mortgaged property to him or to such third person as he may direct, or to execute and (where the mortgage has been effected by a registered instrument) to have registered an acknowledgment in writing that any right in derogation of his interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished.

Provided that the right conferred by this section has not been extinguished by the act of the parties or by decree of a Court.

The right conferred by this section is called a right to redeem and a suit to enforce it is called a suit for redemption.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to render invalid any provision to the effect that, if the time fixed for payment of the principal money has been allowed to pass or no such time has been fixed, the mortgagee shall be entitled to reasonable notice before payment or tender of such money.

Redemption of portion of mortgaged property.--Nothing in this section shall entitle a person interested in a share only of the mortgaged property to redeem his own share only, on payment of a proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, except only where a mortgagee, or, if there are more mortgagees than one, all such mortgages, has or have acquired, in whole or in part, the share of a mortgagor.

(1) Amendment

The section has been amended by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) Right of Redemption

The mortgagor in Indian law is the owner who had parted with some rights of ownership, and the right of redemption is a right which he exercises by virtue of his residuary ownership to resume what he has parted with. The section affirms a right of redemption in all mortgages, and thus carries out the recommendation of the Privy Council in Thumbuswamy's case<sup>83</sup> that the legislature should intervene to recognize a right of redemption in mortgages by conditional sale. In India, this right of redemption is, however, a statutory one, and, therefore, a legal right as stated by the Judicial Committee.

Right of redemption cannot be extinguished by any agreement made at the time of the mortgage as part of the mortgage transaction.<sup>84</sup>

Section 60 provides that at any time after the money becomes due, the mortgagor has a right, on payment or tender, at a proper time and place, of the mortgage-money to require the mortgagee to deliver the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property, and where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor. Such a right of the mortgagor is called, in English law, the equity of redemption. The mortgagor being an owner who has parted with some rights of ownership has a right to get back the mortgage deed or mortgaged property, in exercise of his right of ownership. The right of redemption recognised under the TP Act is thus a statutory and legal right which cannot be extinguished by any agreement made at the time of mortgage as part of the mortgage consideration.<sup>85</sup>

It is well settled that the right of the mortgagor to deal with the mortgaged property as well as the limitation to which it is subject depends upon the nature of this ownership which is not absolute, but qualified by reason of the right of the mortgagee to recover his money out of the proceedings. The right to redeem the mortgage is a very valuable right possessed by the mortgagor. Such a right to redeem the mortgage can be exercised before it is foreclosed, or the estate is sold. The equitable right of redemption is dependent on the mortgagor giving the mortgagee reasonable notice of his intention to redeem, and on his fully performing his obligations under the mortgage.<sup>86</sup>

The right of redemption is an incident of a subsisting mortgage, and subsists so long as the mortgage itself subsists. It can be extinguished as provided in the section and when it is alleged to be extinguished by a decree, the decree should run strictly in accordance with the form prescribed for the purpose.<sup>87</sup> Dismissal of an earlier suit for redemption whether as abated or as withdrawn or in default would not debar the mortgagor from filing a second suit for redemption so long as the mortgage subsists, and the right of redemption is not extinguished by the efflux of time, or by a decree of the court in the prescribed form.<sup>88</sup>

A redemption pre-supposes the existence of a 'mortgage'. As defined in the TP Act, a mortgage is a transfer of an interest in immovable property for the purpose of securing the payment of a loan. It is created by the act of parties. In an usufructuary mortgage, a transfer is made of the right of possession and enjoyment of the usufruct. The rights of a usufructuary mortgagee forms part of the bundle which constitute ownership. The remainder still remains with the mortgagor, and can be transferred by him. The mortgagor's right is as indicated in s 60 of the TP Act, ie, after the principal money has become due, the mortgagor has a right to pay the mortgage money and on such payment, he has the right to require the mortgagee to deliver possession. This right cannot be extinguished except by the act of parties or by a decree of a court. This right is called the right to redeem, and a suit to enforce it, is called a suit for redemption. Thus, the scope of a suit for redemption is primarily to enforce the right to make a payment of the mortgage-money. A claim to redeem a mortgage actually does not attach to the land, although the decree passed in the suit may ultimately affect possession which is also an interest in land.<sup>89</sup>

The section is not prefaced by any such words as 'in the absence of a contract to the contrary.' The right of redemption is, therefore, a statutory right which cannot be fettered by any condition which impedes or prevents redemption.<sup>90</sup> It has further been held that ordinarily, and in the absence of a special condition entitling the mortgagor to redeem during the term for which the mortgage is created, the right of redemption can only arise on the expiration of the specific period.<sup>91</sup> Any such condition is void as a clog on redemption. A mortgagee's suit for sale was compromised on terms that the mortgagor should pay within a specified time and that in default, the mortgagee should take possession as usufructuary mortgagee; and that thereafter the mortgagor should have a right to redeem at any time taking out execution. The Madras High Court held that this term of the consent decree was invalid, as it had the effect of reducing the time for redemption from 60 years to three years.<sup>92</sup> On appeal to the Privy Council, the point did not arise as their Lordships held that on a proper construction of the decree, it did not exclude the mortgagor's remedy by suit.<sup>93</sup> The section further explains when the right of redemption arises; how the right of redemption is exercised, and what are the mortgagor's rights on redemption. A mere agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee by which the mortgagor agrees to convey certain lands to the mortgagee in satisfaction of the mortgage does not extinguish the mortgage.<sup>94</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that the right of redemption under a mortgage deed can come to an end only in a manner known to law. Such extinguishment of the right can take place by a contract between the parties, by a merger or by a statutory provision which debars the mortgagor from redeeming the mortgage. A mortgagee in possession of the property will have to deliver possession to the mortgagor when a suit of redemption is filed, unless he is able to show that the right of redemption has come to an end, or that a suit is liable to be dismissed on some other valid ground.<sup>95</sup>

The mortgagor's right of redemption is exercised by the payment or tender to the mortgagee at the proper time and at the proper place, of the mortgage money. When it is extinguished by the act of parties, the act must take the shape and observe the formalities which the law prescribes. The expression 'act of Parties' refers to some transaction subsequent to the mortgage, and standing apart from the mortgage transaction. A usufructuary mortgagee cannot by mere assertion of his own or by a unilateral action on his part, convert his position on moiety of the property as mortgagee into that of an absolute owner.<sup>96</sup>

The right to redeem follows the interest of the mortgagor, and can be exercised by him and also by those taking the whole of his interest, whether by assignment inter vivos, or by devolution on death.<sup>97</sup>

(3) Right of Redemption and Right of Foreclosure Co-extensive

The mortgagor's right of redemption and the mortgagee's right of foreclosure or sale are co-extensive. When the mortgagor's right to redeem accrues, the mortgagee has a right to enforce his security.<sup>98</sup> But the rule may be limited by the terms of the mortgage and if the limitation is not oppressive or unreasonable, it will be given effect to. Thus, when a mortgage for a fixed term provided that the mortgagee might sue for sale before the expiry of the term if his security were jeopardised, it was held that the right of redemption was not accelerated.<sup>99</sup>

It has been held that the mortgagor can adopt the course provided under s 60 only before the mortgagee has filed a suit for enforcement of the mortgage.<sup>1</sup>

(4) Clog on Redemption

A mortgage being a security for the debt, the right of redemption continues, although the mortgagor fails to pay the debt at the due date. Any provision inserted to prevent, evade, or hamper redemption, is void.

The doctrine has been described as an anachronism by Pollock,<sup>2</sup> who suggested that it be moulded for modern conditions by limiting it to cases where there was something oppressive or unconscionable in the bargain. However, it is settled law in India (by statute) that a mortgage cannot be made altogether irredeemable (except companies), nor can the right of redemption be made illusory. The test suggested by Pollock has, however, been generally applied in determining whether conditions which directly or indirectly fetter or limit the right to redeem, violate the doctrine. In Seth Ganga Dhar v Shankar Lal,<sup>3</sup> J Sarkar explained the basis of the right of the court to intervene thus:

The reason then justifying the court's power to relieve a mortgagor from the effects of his bargain is its want of conscience. Putting it in a more familiar language, the court's jurisdiction to relieve a mortgagor from his bargain depends on whether it was attained by taking advantage of any difficulty or embarrassment that he might have been in when he borrowed the moneys on the mortgage. Was the mortgagor oppressed? Was he imposed upon? If he was, then he may be entitled to relief.

The doctrine does not apply if the transaction is not in its essence a mortgage. Thus, where the transaction gives an option to purchase property, the sole consideration being the loan of a sum of money secured on the property during the continuance of the option, the transaction is the sale of an option, the consideration being the use of the money free of interest.<sup>4</sup>

The doctrine applies to anomalous mortgages.<sup>5</sup> There were some decisions to the contrary when the definition of anomalous mortgages was in a later section;<sup>6</sup> but these are overruled by the Privy Council in Mohammed Sher Khan v Seth Swami Dayal.<sup>7</sup> Even before this decision, the doctrine was applied to simple mortgages usufructuary, which were not then classed as anomalous.<sup>8</sup>

This doctrine also applies to a transaction by which the mortgagor transferred his equity of redemption to the transferee in consideration of a loan; a clause in the said transaction by which the transferee had an option to purchase, was held void.<sup>9</sup>

(5) Companies

The Companies Act 1956 provide that a debenture may be irredeemable, or redeemable only on the happening of a remote contingency or after a very long period. In view of the very wide definition of 'debenture' in the Companies Act 1956, almost every kind of instrument executed by or on behalf of a company which acknowledges the indebtedness of the company, even if it does not create a security on the company's property, it would be a debenture. It follows, therefore, that any mortgage by a company would be a debenture, and that such mortgages may be irredeemable. This has been held by the House of Lords in Knights-bridge Estates Trust v Byme<sup>10</sup> where Lord Maugham expressed the view that there was nothing unfair in this exception. It is submitted that the same view would be adopted in India, as the provisions of the Companies Act 1956, being both a later Act and a special Act, would prevail over s 60 of the TP Act.<sup>11</sup>

(6) Doctrine of Clog on Equity

The doctrine of a clog on the equity of redemption is a rule of justice, equity, and good conscience-this has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in Murarilal v Dev Karan.<sup>12</sup> Chief Justice Gajendragadkar delivering the judgment of the court, observed that there was a long line of authorities in India in which it had been so held, notwithstanding the decisions of the Privy Council in two cases.<sup>13</sup> It follows that the doctrine is applicable in an area where the TP Act is not in force.<sup>14</sup> This is also supported by the fact that s 60 is not subject to a contract to the contrary. The Supreme Court has held that, it is a settled law in England and in India that a mortgage cannot be made altogether irredeemable, or redemption made illusory. The law must respond, and be responsive to the felt and discernible compulsions of circumstances that would be equitable, fair and just; unless there is anything to the contrary in the statute. Law must take cognisance of that fact, and act accordingly. In the context of fast changing circumstances and economic stability, a long term for redemption makes an illusory mortgage, though not decisive. It should prima facie be an indication as to how clogs on equity of redemption should be judged.<sup>15</sup>

Though the TP Act does not apply to Sikkim, the courts should apply the principle contained in s 60 and strike down a clog on the right of redemption, since the principle 'once a mortgage always a mortgage' is a rule of justice, equity, and good conscience.<sup>16</sup>

The term in the mortgage deed that the land is irredeemable for 95 years is a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>17</sup> In Shivdev Singh v Sucha Singh<sup>18</sup> the Supreme Court refused to interfere with the finding of the high court holding that on the facts of the case, the mortgage deed providing a period of 99 years was a clog on equity of redemption.

Whether in a particular transaction there is a clog on the equity of redemption, depends primarily upon the period of redemption, the circumstances under which the mortgage was created, the economic and financial position of the mortgagor and his relationship vis-a-vis him and the mortgagee, the economic and social conditions in a particular country at a particular point of time, custom, if any prevalent in the community or the society in which the transaction takes place, and the totality of the circumstances under which a mortgage is created, namely, circumstances of the parties, the time, the situation, the clauses for redemption either for payment of interest or any other sum, the obligation of the mortgagee to construct or repair or maintain the mortgaged property in cases of usufructuary mortgage, to manage as a matter of prudent management; these factors must be correlated to each other and viewed in a comprehensive conspicuum in the background of the facts and circumstances of each case, to determine whether there are clogs on equity of redemption.<sup>19</sup>

A long term of redemption is not necessarily a clog; whether a particular term of redemption operates as a clog is to be considered having regard to the circumstances of the case.<sup>20</sup>

The decision as to what amounts to a clog on the equity of redemption is a question of fact in each case.

(7) Condition of Sale in Default

A condition converting a mortgage into a sale is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>21</sup>

In a case before the Supreme Court relating to a mortgage by conditional sale, the mortgagor was given four years' time from the date of execution of the deed of mortgage to repay the same. However, another clause provided that if the mortgagee received notice of re-entry from a public authority for breach of covenants of the lease before the expiry of four years, then the transfer in favour of the mortgagee shall be made absolute, and the expenses shall be borne by the mortgagor. This was held to be a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>22</sup> A condition that 'if we do not pay your amount by the due date, we agree to this document being treated as a sale deed', was held to be a clog on the equity of redemption, and the document was held to be a mortgage.<sup>23</sup> A stipulation in a mortgage deed, that if the property is not redeemed within one year then, the mortgage shall be turned into a sale, is void.<sup>24</sup> An agreement that in default of payment on the date fixed, the mortgagor shall sell the property to the mortgagee at a price to be fixed by an umpire is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>25</sup> A stipulation in a mortgage deed giving a right to the mortgagee to purchase a part or interest in the mortgaged property, or a stipulation giving him a right of pre-emption at a fixed price which is not fair, is a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>26</sup> So also, is a condition allowing the mortgagee to enter into possession as a tenant in case of default,<sup>27</sup> or a condition in a usufructuary mortgage for a fixed term that in default it should work itself out into a sale,<sup>28</sup> or that part of the land mortgaged should not be returned on redemption,<sup>29</sup> or that the mortgagor shall not be entitled to get possession of the property mortgaged under a previous usufructuary mortgage, unless he paid the money due under the subsequent mortgage.<sup>30</sup> Such a condition is in fact a condition preventing redemption. A condition of mortgagee getting his name mutated if the mortgage is not redeemed within four months, is a clog on equity redemption.<sup>31</sup>

A clause in a compromise decree in a mortgage suit under which the mortgagee was entitled to take possession if payment was not made in eight months was held not to be a clog, as the Code of Civil Procedure provided a period of six months.<sup>32</sup>

A stipulation in a mortgage deed that after the deposit of the title deeds in suits in which the mortgaged property was involved, the mortgagor would execute a deed of sale in favour of the mortgagee, failing which the mortgagee can have the sale deed executed in his favour through the court, is a clog, and is void.<sup>33</sup> Where a provision in a mortgage deed being a clog on the equity of redemption is void and unenforceable as against the mortgagor, it can have no more binding force against the assignee of the mortgagor.<sup>34</sup>

(8) Subsequent Sale Valid

A condition of sale is a clog, if it is part and parcel of the mortgage transaction. However, subsequent to the mortgage, the mortgagee may stipulate for the purchase of the property from the mortgagor.<sup>35</sup> In Shankar Din v Gokal Prasad,<sup>36</sup> the Privy Council said that there was nothing in law to prevent the parties to a mortgage from coming to a subsequent arrangement qualifying the right of redemption. A separate transaction dehors the mortgage, and is not a clog and may have the effect of extinguishing the equity of redemption.<sup>37</sup>

Illustrations

(1) A mortgaged his land to B with possession for five years the rents and profits to be set off against interest. The mortgage further provided that if the mortgage was not redeemed within a period of 20 years from the due date, the mortgagee should treat the land as sold to him absolutely. This provision was invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption and the mortgage was redeemable even after the period of 20 years.<sup>38</sup>

(2) A mortgaged his land to B with possession and the mortgage provided that in default of redemption after 20 years, B should be owner of half the land. This provision was a clog on the equity of redemption. But four years after the expiry of the period of 20 years while B was still in possession, A executed a deed by which half the land was conveyed to B, and B released the other half from the mortgage. This was an arrangement for the discharge of the mortgage and was valid.<sup>39</sup>

In a case where the mortgage provided that in default of payment, the mortgagee should become absolute owner and the mortgagor in ignorance of his rights, surrendered the land to the mortgagee, the court could, give no relief. This was really a surrender subsequent to the mortgage, which the court could not set aside as there was no fraud.<sup>40</sup> But a mere admission that the mortgagee had become owner will not destroy the equity of redemption.<sup>41</sup> Nor is the mortgage extinguished by an understanding that the mortgage has been converted into a sale, if such understanding and conduct is solely due to the gahan lahan clause, and not any transaction independent of the mortgage.<sup>42</sup>

(9) Stipulation to Demolish Structure

The mortgagee was, by the mortgage, given the right to demolish the existing structure and to construct a new one, the expenses to be reimbursed by the mortgagor at the time of redemption. It was found that the mortgagor was financially hard-pressed. The terms were held to be unreasonable and unconscionable, and to constitute a clog on the equity of redemption, and therefore, not binding.<sup>43</sup>

(10) Condition Postponing Redemption in Case of Default

Such a condition is a clog on the equity of redemption, and is invalid. In Mohammed Sher Khan v Seth Swami Dayal,<sup>44</sup> the mortgage was for a term of five years with a condition that if the money was not paid, the mortgagee might enter into possession for a period of 12 years during which the mortgagor could not redeem. The Privy Council held that the condition hindered an existing right to redeem and was, therefore, invalid. Again, a condition that in default the mortgage should be renewed for a period of 40 years, is invalid.<sup>45</sup> The Allahabad High Court has said that no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what is improper restraint on alienation, and upheld a condition that in default of redemption on due date, the mortgage should not be redeemable for a further period of 20 years.<sup>46</sup> It is submitted that this decision is inconsistent with Mohammed Sher Khan's case.<sup>47</sup> In a Bombay case,<sup>48</sup> the mortgage was for a term of 21 years in order that the mortgagee should plant an orchard, but there was a condition that in default of redemption at the expiry of 21 years, the mortgagee should be allowed to retain possession as long as the trees bore fruit. The condition was not enforced as the mortgagor was an agriculturist within the Dakkan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

(11) Terms for Redemption

It has been held that if the mortgagor allows the normal limitation period to expire, he can then only file a suit on the basis of deferred date of redemption. But he will be precluded from saying that the deferred date amounts to a clog on redemption.<sup>49</sup> On the question of postponement of date of redemption not amounting to a clog, the court referred to an earlier Supreme Court judgment.<sup>50</sup>

(12) Penalty in Case of Default

A stipulation for a penalty in case of default is relieved against. Thus, a stipulation that in case of default one murra of rice was to be paid for every rupee of the debt, was set aside as unreasonable.<sup>51</sup> But if there is no question of penalty, stipulation for enhanced interest or for compound interest from date of default are valid;<sup>52</sup> but if the original rate of interest is high, a stipulation for compound interest in default may be a penalty.<sup>53</sup> A stipulation for enhanced interest from the date of the bond would always be a penalty.<sup>54</sup>

If there is no undue influence or unfair dealing, a high rate of interest is not a clog.<sup>55</sup> The court cannot, except under the provisions of The Usurious Loans Act 1918, give relief against excessive interest.<sup>56</sup> However, 24 per cent with six-monthly interest in a deed of further charge, has been relieved against;<sup>57</sup> so also, where the interest at 24 per cent was coupled with a long term (49 years).<sup>58</sup> A usufructuary mortgagee may of course, stipulate for interest as well as for profits.<sup>59</sup>

(13) Restraint of Alienation

A condition restraining alienation by the mortgagor is a clog on the equity of redemption, for it will not recognize the transferee as having acquired the right of redemption.<sup>60</sup> So also is a stipulation that the mortgagor shall redeem without having recourse to a loan from anybody.<sup>61</sup> However, a stipulation that the mortgagor might redeem before due date, if he could do so without alienating other property was upheld as a special concession personal to the mortgagor, and not available to his assignee.<sup>62</sup>

(14) Long Term

A long term for redemption is not necessarily a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>63</sup> Indeed, a long term may suit both parties, relieving the mortgagor of the necessity of finding another creditor, and being a long-term investment for the mortgagee.

In India, terms of a longer duration have been upheld, and this principle has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in Seth Ganga Dhar v Shankar Lal,<sup>64</sup> in which a term of 85 years was upheld. Instances of other cases are set out below.<sup>65</sup> However, a term of 200 years has been held to be a clog.<sup>66</sup> But if there are circumstances which indicate that the length of the term is unreasonable or oppressive, redemption has been allowed before the expiry of the term.<sup>67</sup>

A mere long period for redemption would not amount to a clog on the equity of redemption, in the absence of other evidence showing that the mortgagee had taken undue advantage of his position as lender.<sup>68</sup> Mortgage deed providing for a redemption period of 99 years is not per se void ab initio. On the facts of the case, the court on being approached may hold it to be inequitable, and declare it to be a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>69</sup> In a 99-years mortgage, a suit filed before 99 years but after 30 years from the date of mortgage deed and without any prayer for lifting of clog on equity of redemption, could be resisted by the mortgagee only on the ground that it was premature.<sup>70</sup>

In a Punjab and Haryana case, there was a usufructuary mortgage of land with possession. The mortgagor was allowed to redeem only after 90 years. The mortgage amount was not less than the market value of the land at the relevant time. There was no allegation of fraud, or undue influence. It was held that in these circumstances, the long term of 90 years was not a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>71</sup>

In the facts and circumstances of a case, postponement or redemption for a long time, may constitute a clog on the equity of redemption. It will be necessary in this context to consider, besides other factors, the amount advanced under the mortgage, the nature of the security offered by the mortgagor, the circumstances in which the mortgagor was compelled to secure the amount, the terms and conditions on which the amount was, in fact, advanced and the other alternatives to which the mortgagor could have taken recourse for obtaining the same advance. Applying this test, in a Gujarat case, a condition postponing redemption was held to be a clog on the facts of the case. The mortgagor was a childless widow, who had mortgaged the property in question for 199 years to secure a debt of Rs 61 in 1909, although it was not customary or necessary to submit to such a long term. The mortgagee, who was the owner of the adjacent property, obtained a collateral advantage of beneficial enjoyment in respect of his own property for a long period of time, to the detriment of the mortgagor. Further, under the mortgage, the mortgagee was entitled to raise any construction and the mortgagor was, at the time of redemption, bound to pay the costs of the construction. Viewed along with all these circumstances, the long time of redemption, being unconscionable, was held to constitute a clog.<sup>72</sup>

Illustration

A mortgaged his property to B by an usufructuary mortgage for a term of 101 years. The mortgage provided that A should be liable for interest at 8 1/2 per cent and that B should take the rents and profits; that if the rents and profits exceed the interest, B should take the surplus but that if the rents and profits were less than the interest, A was liable for the deficit; and that at the expiry of the term, A should be entitled to redeem on payment of three times the principal money. These provisions rendered redemption onerous and difficult without any corresponding benefit to the mortgagor. A was entitled to an account and redemption before the expiry of the term.<sup>73</sup>

On the other hand, the Allahabad High Court had held that a long period even though coupled with onerous and oppressive terms, affords no ground for interference, unless there has been coercion, fraud or undue influence.<sup>74</sup> This decision is no longer good law in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Seth Ganga Dhar v Shankar Lal.<sup>75</sup> In another case, the same high court held that a condition in a mortgage that if the mortgagee construed a new building by demolishing an old one which was a kutcha structure, the mortgagor would pay the cost of its construction at the time of redemption, was not a clog.<sup>76</sup>

If there is a long term without a mutual provision for the continuance of the loan, as when the right of redemption is postponed and the mortgagee is given the right to call in his money at any time, the stipulation for postponement becomes unilateral, void of consideration and invalid. This is because the right of redemption and the right for foreclosure, are coextensive.<sup>77</sup> So an arbitrary stipulation that the mortgagor shall redeem only when the mortgagee demands his money is void;<sup>78</sup> and a covenant by the mortgagor for the perpetual renewal of the mortgage is inoperative.<sup>79</sup>

In Hira Kuar v Gambhir Singh,<sup>80</sup> a mortgage for a term of 40 years stipulated that in default of payment of interest for any one year, the mortgagee would be entitled to sue at once for the mortgage money, and it was held that this provision gave the mortgagor, a right to redeem before the expiry of the fixed period. So also, a condition in a mortgage deed that so long as the mortgage money was kept with the mortgagor, he would pay interest to the mortgagee's wife, did not preclude the mortgagor from filing a suit for redemption earlier.<sup>81</sup> However, a right to sue for the mortgage-money in case the security is endangered, is not oppressive so as to accelerate the right of redemption.<sup>82</sup>

It has been said that a long term in a usufructuary mortgage is less likely to operate as a clog on redemption, as redemption is effected upon payment of a fixed sum, and there is no danger of arrears of interest exceeding the value of the property.<sup>83</sup> A stipulated postponing of redemption for a period of 40 years with a condition that in default of redemption on a particular day, the mortgage would be renewed for another period of 40 years, was held to be a clog on redemption.<sup>84</sup> So also, a term of 95 years with a condition that interest should be paid only with the principal.<sup>85</sup> A condition that a usufructuary mortgage should be redeemed on a particular day 60 years later, and on no other day, is void as a clog on redemption.<sup>86</sup> However, a condition that the mortgage could only be redeemed during the month of Vaisakh was upheld.<sup>87</sup> A covenant in a mortgage for possession for 51 years, together with a high rate of interest and also a covenant that the expenses of repairs be added to the mortgage-money, were not held to be a clog on redemption.<sup>88</sup>

A condition in a mortgage which seeks to take away the right of redemption even before the period of four years within which the mortgagor was entitled to pay off the mortgage debt had run out, is obviously a clog on the equity of redemption. In this case, the condition was that on the mortgagor receiving notice of re-entry from the land and development officer or any such authority for breach of a covenant of the lease before the said period of four years, 'the transfer hereby made shall be absolutely in favour of the mortgagee.....'.<sup>89</sup>

A mere long term of redemption postponing the right of redemption for a given number of years may not, in itself, amount to a clog on the equity of redemption. But such a term, if coupled with any other condition that authorises the mortgagee in possession so to convert the property mortgaged in the meantime as to make it practically impossible for the original mortgagor to redeem the property, may be regarded as a clog.<sup>90</sup>

(15) Collateral Benefit to the Mortgagee

A collateral stipulation is objectionable only if it is unfair and unconscionable, ie, imposed in a merely reprehensible manner, and not merely if it is unreasonable. A stipulation for repayment in foreign currency is not a clog, even if the value of the named foreign currency has multiplied.<sup>91</sup>

In India, a collateral advantage that extends beyond the period of redemption is invalid. Chief Justice Sargent set aside a permanent lease granted by a mortgagor to a mortgagee on the ground that the parties were not in a position to deal on equal terms.<sup>92</sup> A condition that after redemption the mortgagee should continue in possession as a permanent tenant is invalid, as it prevents the mortgagor from getting back the property free and unfettered.<sup>93</sup> Such a condition is a clog on the equity of redemption, and it does not cease to be a clog merely because the mortgagor was not in a difficult or embarrassed situation, or because those conditions were not imposed by the mortgagee forcibly.<sup>94</sup>

In view of the legislation in this country providing security of tenancies, the chances of the mortgagee being evicted from such property become very bleak, and the condition would be very harsh and burdensome.

If the mortgagee, in exercise of a power given to him by the mortgage, has leased out the property then, when the mortgage is redeemed, the only possession that could be decreed is possession through the tenant, and not khas possession.<sup>95</sup>

A lease by a mortgagor to a mortgagee to last during the pendency of the mortgage is valid.<sup>96</sup> But in another case,<sup>97</sup> the Bombay High Court held that an agreement to pay remuneration to a mortgagee mill manager was not a clog on redemption, although the same court had said seven years previously, apparently with reference to the early English case, that it was a well established principle that a mortgagee cannot charge for his personal services.<sup>98</sup> In Chalikani Venkatarayanim v Zamindar of Tuni,<sup>99</sup> the Privy Council held that an agreement that a mortgagee in possession should charge a fixed sum annually for repairs and contingent charges, was not a clog on redemption.

In Oudh, a stipulation that the mortgagor should pay on redemption deorha, ie, the principal and half as much again, has been held to be valid.<sup>1</sup>

A condition for pre-emption in favour of the mortgagee is, it is submitted, a clog on redemption, for the mortgagor gets back his property on redemption fettered with this stipulation.<sup>2</sup> The cases on the subject are not consistent. In a Madras case,<sup>3</sup> J Bhashyam Ayyangar suggests that if the price is not fixed and if the right of pre-emption does not continue after redemption, there is no clog as the mortgagor may sell or not as he pleases. In a later case, the same high court following the decision of the House of Lords in Samuel v Jarrah, Timber & Wood Paving Corp,<sup>4</sup> held that an agreement incorporated in a mortgage deed to sell the property to the mortgagee for the price already agreed upon operated as a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>5</sup>

In 1948, the Madras High Court held<sup>6</sup> that an agreement incorporated in a mortgage deed to sell the property to the mortgagee for the price already agreed upon, was held as operating as a clog on the equity of redemption. The Allahabad and Patna High Courts have said of a covenant for pre-emption at a fixed price that the covenant for pre-emption was enforceable if the bargain was not unconscionable, and if the right did not continue after redemption.<sup>7</sup> The Calcutta High Court has held that a stipulation for pre-emption is valid, and not contrary to public policy.<sup>8</sup>

The Madras High Court has observed that the relaxation of the rule of equity in Kreglinger's case does not affect the construction of a statutory enactment such as this section.<sup>9</sup> But the tendency to restore freedom of contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee which that case discloses, and which is apparent in the protests of Lord Halsbury and

Macnaghten in Samuel v Jarrah, Timber & Wood Paving Corp,<sup>10</sup> may also be observed in the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Kanhaya Lal v National Bank of India.<sup>11</sup> Indian cases were cited to show the necessity to protect mortgagors from a power of sale without the intervention of the court, and their Lordships said it was absurd to apply the reasoning of those cases to a transaction between a limited company, and the trustees of debenture holders.<sup>12</sup>

In a case the plaintiff, a private company, with a view to construct a cinema hall on the land purchased by it and to liquidate the earlier mortgage debt executed a mortgage-deed with the condition that the amount of loan after paying for the earlier mortgage will remain with the defendants who had agreed to advance it only if the contract of construction of the cinema house was made with them, to construct the cinema house for the plaintiff. Simultaneously, a deed of partnership was also executed between the parties at the instance of the defendants which according to the plaintiff was not intended to be acted upon, and was only intended to provide security to the defendant for the expenses that they may have to incur in connection with the construction work over and above the sum retained by the defendants, who on the other hand asserted that they were partners of a lawfully constituted firm for running the cinema business. The defendants did not invest any amount in the partnership business, nor did they actually pay any sum to the plaintiff. Under the terms of the partnership deed, the plaintiff forfeited all their rights even to carry out business. The most eloquent proof of the terms being unreasonable was the fact that the defendants were not to contribute anything to the partnership business, but were entitled to run it in any manner they liked to the exclusion of the plaintiff. The court held that the terms of the partnership deed which specifically referred to the mortgage transaction and sought to establish claims of the defendants arising out of the mortgage transaction stipulating first charge in respect of advances made by the defendants towards the construction of a cinema hall, were oppressive and unconscionable, and constituted a fetter on the equity of redemption.<sup>13</sup>

(16) Subsequent Agreement Postponing Redemption

A subsequent agreement which has the effect of postponing redemption, or which postpones redemption may be either (1) an agreement which creates a personal obligation; or (2) a charge or a mortgage creating a right in rem.

If the agreement creates only a personal obligation, it is a clog on redemption, for the mortgagor is entitled to get back his land on payment of the debt secured upon it. So if the mortgagor borrows a fresh sum, and executes a money bond agreeing not to redeem the mortgage until the bond is paid off, the agreement is invalid.<sup>14</sup> So also, a condition in a mortgage bond that the mortgage shall not be redeemed until a previous personal loan is paid off, is a clog on redemption; but the Bombay High Court has said that this was not so in cases before the TP Act.<sup>15</sup> On the other hand, if the mortgaged property is made security for the repayment of the further advances, the agreement not to redeem the first mortgage until the second debt is paid off is valid, for the agreement operates as a deed of further charge, and the mortgagor can redeem only on payment of all the moneys secured.<sup>16</sup> In a case where some of the mortgagors have executed deeds creating a further charge in favour of the mortgagee, he cannot in a suit for the redemption of the mortgage, compel the payment of the sum due in respect of the further charge. He can enforce that right in a separate suit.<sup>17</sup>

No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to whether the agreement operates as a further charge, and each case must be decided on the construction of the particular document.<sup>18</sup> Thus, a clause in a mortgage which did not clearly operate as a stipulation for the renewal of the mortgage, was held as not barring a suit for redemption.<sup>19</sup>

Illustrations

(1) A borrows money from B, and executes a usufructuary mortgage for the amount redeemable in any month of Jeth. A then borrows a further sum from B and executes a simple money bond in which he covenants not to redeem the mortgage until the money due on the latter bond is paid. This covenant is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.<sup>20</sup>

(2) A borrows Rs 500 from B and executes a usufructuary mortgage for Rs 300, the rents and profits to be taken in lieu of interest. A covenants in the deed that the payment of the balance of Rs 200 with interest at 2 per cent per mensem would be compulsory at the time of redemption. The covenant is not a clog on redemption, but creates a further charge for Rs 200.<sup>21</sup>

(3) A borrows Rs 500 from B and executes a usufructuary mortgage in his favour. A then borrows a further sum of Rs 50 from B and executes a mashral- ul-rah (or additional mortgage), containing the following covenant:

the stipulation is that when I shall redeem the land mortgaged I shall also pay the said amount, with interest at the stipulated rate, and the mortgaged property shall be redeemed. Without payment of the said sum, the property shall not be redeemed.

It was held that the covenant was not a clog on redemption, but created a further charge.<sup>22</sup>

(4) A borrowed Rs 1,500 from B and executed a mortgage for Rs 1,500. The mortgage bond recited that Rs 5,000 was due on a previous Khata, and A promised to pay this sum and covenanted not to redeem the mortgage till both sums of Rs 1,500 and Rs 5,000 were paid. The deed was stamped for Rs 6,500. It was held that Rs 5,000 were also secured by way of mortgage, and that there was no question of a clog on redemption.<sup>23</sup>

If a person executes two successive mortgages of his property, in favour of another to secure separate debts, a stipulation in the second mortgage that the mortgagor shall not be entitled to redeem the first mortgage, unless he also paid the debt secured by the second mortgage, is perfectly valid.<sup>24</sup> The mortgagee is entitled in such a case to resist redemption of the first mortgage, unless the second debt is discharged even if his right to enforce the second mortgage is barred by limitation.<sup>25</sup> The rule, however, does not apply when the mortgagees are different. Thus, if A mortgages to a firm and then for a further advance makes a second mortgage to a part in that firm stipulating that he will not redeem the partnership mortgage before paying the personal debt, that stipulation will not prevent him from redeeming the partnership mortgage first.<sup>26</sup>

Again, if the previous advance, whether secured or unsecured, is secured on the mortgage given at the time of second advance, the case is different because both the transactions become merged in one mortgage.<sup>27</sup> However, one mortgagor cannot by executing a mortgage affect the right of his co-mortgagors to redeem. Thus, in a case where K and L in 1876 executed a mortgage to T, and then K alone in 1891 executed a second mortgage to T which contained a condition that he would not redeem it without at the same time redeeming the mortgage of 1876; L was allowed to redeem the first mortgage without redeeming the second.<sup>28</sup>

(17) When the Right of Redemption Arises

The right of redemption arises when the principal money secured by the mortgage has become due and may be exercised at any time thereafter, subject of course to the law of limitation. There were a considerable number of Indian cases in which it was held that the time fixed in the deed was fixed for the convenience of the mortgagor, and that he could redeem before that time, unless there was an express stipulation to the contrary.<sup>29</sup> These cases are bad law, for the view taken in other cases<sup>30</sup> that the mortgagor cannot redeem before the time fixed for payment is confirmed by the decision of the Judicial Committee in Bakhtawar Begam v Husaini Khanam.<sup>31</sup> Their Lordships said that ordinarily, in the absence of a special condition entitling the mortgagor to redeem during the term for which the mortgage is created, the right of redemption can only arise on the expiration of the specified period; but that there is nothing in law to prevent the parties from making a provision that the mortgagor may discharge the debt within the specified period, and take back the property, such a provision being usually to the advantage of the mortgagor.<sup>32</sup> The time for payment is sometimes expressed to be within a certain number of years. There is a conflict of decisions as to whether this imports a right to redeem earlier.<sup>33</sup> It is submitted that this is purely a matter of construction of the deed. In the case of Hewanchal v Jawahir,<sup>34</sup> the mortgage was for eight years with a condition that the mortgagor might redeem on payment of the whole amount due at the second, fourth, and the eighth years. If the mortgage fixes no time for payment, the mortgagor may redeem at any time.<sup>35</sup>

A mortgagor is not entitled to redeem before the expiry of the stipulated period merely on the ground that the mortgagee in possession has done something which he was not authorised to do.<sup>36</sup> A condition in a mortgage allowing the mortgagee to plant trees and to recover compensation, therefore, at a certain rate for a number of years, would not entitle the mortgagor to sue for redemption before the expiry of the said period.<sup>37</sup> In an usufructuary mortgage, there can be a term fixed for the mortgagee's enjoyment during which redemption cannot take place.<sup>38</sup>

Where the mortgage-deed provided that it could be redeemed 12 years after the mortgagee obtained possession of all the lands, some of which were in the possession of tenants, and subsequent events made it impossible to obtain such possession, it was held that the mortgage could be redeemed any time after the expiry of 12 years.<sup>39</sup>

In some agricultural tenancies, time is of the essence of the contract, for redemption at any other time would prejudice agricultural operations. So when a mortgage was redeemable in Jeth of any year, it cannot be redeemed in any other month.<sup>40</sup> When the mortgage-money was deposited in the month of Jeth, that is at harvest time, but too late for notice to be served on the mortgagee in that month, the Allahabad High Court treated it as available for redemption from the month of Jeth of the next year.<sup>41</sup>

The mortgagor may on equitable grounds, be allowed to redeem before the expiry of the term on account of a default of the mortgagee. Thus, in Chhotku Rai v Baldeo<sup>42</sup> the mortgage was for Rs 599. 15, and the mortgagee was to discharge prior encumbrances out of the mortgage money. The mortgagee only advanced Rs 50. 15, and did not discharge the encumbrances. The assignee of the mortgagor was allowed to redeem before the expiry of the term. On the other hand, in order to avoid multiplicity of actions, the mortgagor may in some cases be refused redemption, unless he at the same time pays an unsecured debt. If the mortgaged property is in the hands of an heir or devisee of the mortgagor as assets for the payment of an unsecured debt, the mortgagee may if the assets are sufficient for the payment of all creditors tack the unsecured debt to his mortgage debt<sup>43</sup> -- but not if the estate is insolvent.<sup>44</sup> Such tacking was permitted in a Bombay case<sup>45</sup> where the mortgagor had in his lifetime assigned his whole estate to the plaintiff with an obligation to pay his debts, and the plaintiff was not allowed to redeem the mortgage without paying an unsecured debt also.

(18) Exercise of Right of Redemption

The mortgagor's right of redemption is exercised by the payment or tender to the mortgagee at the proper time, and at the proper place of the mortgage-money. A right to redeem can be extinguished by the act of the parties, or by a decree of the court, or also by the operation of law. When it is extinguished by the act of parties, the act must take the shape and observe the formalities which the law prescribes. For instance, if the extinguishment is by payment in cash or by a transfer of property which does not require registration, then no formality beyond the delivery of possession, and the occupation by the mortgagee in full and proper discharge is necessary. However, if the agreement is to transfer immovable property exceeding Rs 100 in value, then a writing and registration are necessary because in that case the title cannot pass by mere delivery of possession.<sup>46</sup>

The discharge of a debt by the operation of a statute does not amount to the redemption of the mortgage, to make the continuance of possession by the mortgagee adverse to the mortgagor.<sup>47</sup>

Pursuant to s 60, the continuance in possession of a mortgagee after the period of redemption cannot necessarily be adverse to that of the owner. The question is always one of the intention of the parties concerned.<sup>48</sup>

Once the mortgage money has been paid, the mortgage comes to an end, though the statutory right to recover possession survives.<sup>49</sup> A conjoint reading of s 60, s 76(h) read with s 83 of the TP Act would amplify that on deposit of the mortgage amount, the contractual relationship of the mortgagor and mortgagee ceases.<sup>50</sup>

(19) Payment

Payment may be made not only to the mortgagee, but also to an authorised agent of the mortgagee, eg the mortgagee's solicitor,<sup>51</sup> but a payment to an agent who disclaims authority is made at the payer's risk.<sup>52</sup> Where there are several mortgagees, there is a conflict of decisions as to whether payment to one is valid. The Madras High Court has held that payment to one of several mortgagees is a valid discharge.<sup>53</sup> This was doubted in several Madras cases,<sup>54</sup> and was not followed in Bombay and Calcutta.<sup>55</sup> In Annapurnamma v Akkayya,<sup>56</sup> a Full Bench of the Madras High Court held that one of the several payees of a negotiable instrument can give a valid discharge of the entire debt, but CJ White in a dissenting judgment was of opinion that the equitable presumption of a tenancy in common should prevail. This opinion has since been followed,<sup>57</sup> and it is unquestionably correct, for the security being in favour of several mortgagees cannot be re-transferred by any one of them and, therefore, the mortgage cannot be discharged except by payment to all. In an Allahabad case,<sup>58</sup> a full discharge given by one of two joint mortgagees was held to operate in respect of his share only. The Judicial Committee in Shrinivasdas Bavri v Meherbai<sup>59</sup> held that one of two mortgagees was not bound by a recital of a release given by the other, and this decision in effect overrules Barber Maran v Ramana.<sup>60</sup> But even after this decision, the Madras High Court has held that a purchase by one of several co-mortgagees of the equity of redemption has the effect of extinguishing the mortgage,<sup>61</sup> and that the appropriation of the income by a co-mortgagee in possession was a valid discharge of the mortgagee.<sup>62</sup> The Bombay High Court has held that in the case of payment to the heirs of a mortgagee, payment must be made to all, unless they have constituted one of their members as karta or manager;<sup>63</sup> or, according to the Patna High Court,<sup>64</sup> the manager's agent. It was also held in the Patna case that even where the mortgage deed contained a stipulation that the only evidence which the parties could rely upon in support of any payments made in satisfaction of the mortgage debt would be payments endorsed on the mortgage-deed itself, it was open to the mortgagor to rely upon evidence other than the endorsements on the mortgage bond, such as a receipt signed by the mortgagee or his agent.

Payment must be made in the current coin of the realm or currency notes, unless the mortgagee accepts some other form of payment.<sup>65</sup> If the debt is contracted in any particular currency, it must be repaid in that currency or its equivalent.<sup>66</sup>

A mortgagor is not bound to pay the executors of a mortgagee, until they obtain probate.<sup>67</sup>

If the mortgagee recovers more than is due, the mortgagor may recover the overpayment as money received by the mortgagee to his use, or, alternatively, money paid by mistake, or alternatively by tracing.<sup>68</sup>

If the redemption amount paid is less than the figure actually due, the mortgagee can claim the deficiency subject to any issue of estoppel.<sup>69</sup>

(20) Tender Must be Unconditional

In a case where the purchaser of the equity of redemption made a tender conditional on the delivery of the title deeds to him, the tender was held to be conditional and void.<sup>70</sup> It is submitted, however, that a tender coupled with a demand for something which the creditor is bound in law to perform on being paid, is not conditional.<sup>71</sup> The law as enacted in s 38 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 is less rigid than the English law.<sup>72</sup> A tender under protest is a valid tender, for the protest is not a condition, but merely a notice that the tender is not an admission, and the creditor had only to say, 'I take the money; protest as much as you please'.<sup>73</sup> Tender must be in current coin or currency notes. The old rule that the money must be shown to the creditor to tempt him<sup>74</sup> is now obsolete and if the debtor is ready to produce the money and offers to pay it, and the creditor dispenses with production at the time that is sufficient. In a case before the Privy Council,<sup>75</sup> their Lordships quoted with approval the following passage from the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in Hunter v Daniel<sup>76</sup>:

The practice of the courts is not to require a party to make a formal tender where from the facts stated in the bill or from the evidence it appears that the tender would have been a mere form and that the party to whom it was made would have refused to accept the money.

In the case before the Privy Council, a purchaser of the equity of redemption wrote a letter asking to be informed of the amount of the balance due, and promising to send the money on receipt of a reply. The mortgagee replied that there was no need for him to pay as there was a covenant against alienation in the mortgage-deed, but at the conclusion, the letter stated what was the balance due on the mortgage. The covenant against alienation was of course invalid and as the mortgagee stated what was the amount due and no attempt was made by the mortgagor to pay it, their Lordships said they were 's unable to construe the (mortgagee's s) letter as equivalent to any such clear release to the mortgagor of his obligation to tender the money as is required in order to justify him in not having presented it for receipt's.<sup>77</sup> In another case, when the mortgagor went with the money to the mortgagee and did not pay it as the mortgagee demanded extra interest, that was good tender.<sup>78</sup> However, a mere expression of willingness to pay is insufficient,<sup>79</sup> for the money must be available for immediate delivery;<sup>80</sup> and even an offer by letter to pay is not sufficient.<sup>81</sup>

Tender of less than the proper amount is invalid according to the rule in Dixon v Clarke;<sup>82</sup> but in Haji Abdul v Haji Noor Mahomed<sup>83</sup> J Telang said this rule was limited to cases where the party making the tender admits that more is due than is tendered, but it is difficult to understand why the mortgagees should suffer for the mortgagor's s mistake.<sup>84</sup> But the creditor may accept the amount tendered in part payment, if the debtor does not make it a condition that the tender is to be in discharge of the whole.<sup>85</sup>

In the absence of a stipulation to that effect, the mortgagee is entitled to decline to receive payment by instalments.<sup>86</sup>

A valid tender, with continued readiness to pay, stops the running of interest.<sup>87</sup> However, not so an invalid tender.<sup>88</sup>

A tender improperly rejected is not equivalent to payment.<sup>89</sup>

Justice Phear said in an old case,<sup>90</sup> that tender by one of several mortgagors is not valid. But that is incorrect, for any of the several mortgagors can redeem and it is sufficient here, as in England, that tender should be made by a person having a prima facie right to redeem. The costs of a suit for redemption are payable by the mortgagor; but if a mortgagee improperly refuses to accept a tender, he may be refused his costs or ordered to pay costs.<sup>91</sup>

Instead of making tender to the mortgagee personally, the mortgagor may make a deposit in court under s 83, but such deposit does not of course, put an end to the relationship of the mortgagor and mortgagee.<sup>92</sup>

In the case of an usufructuary mortgage when the debt has been satisfied out of the usufruct, there is no question of tender.<sup>93</sup>

In a suit for redemption, it is not necessary to prove a previous tender.<sup>94</sup> The Allahabad High Court once held that it was necessary;<sup>95</sup> but the Madras High Court disagreed.<sup>96</sup> The later Allahabad cases follow the judgement of Madras High Court.<sup>97</sup>

According to the Bombay view, the mortgagor is not required to tender the amount due under the mortgage before suing for redemption. If he makes such a tender, he gets certain benefits under ss 83 and 84. However, he is not legally bound to do so.<sup>98</sup>

(21) Mortgage Money

A mortgagee is entitled to treat interest due under the mortgage as a charge on the estate.<sup>99</sup> Mortgage money, therefore, includes both principal and interest.<sup>1</sup> This accords with the definition in s 58(a). Mortgage-money also includes costs properly incurred by the mortgagee.<sup>2</sup>

(22) Mortgagor's s Right on Redemption

The mortgagor's s right on redemption are: (1) delivery of the mortgage-deed and documents of title relating to the mortgaged property; (2) possession; and (3) reconveyance or acknowledgment.

(23) Delivery of the Mortgage Deed

The mortgagor has a right on redemption to the return of the mortgage-deed, and documents of title relating to the mortgaged property. The provision as to documents relating to the property which are in possession or power of the mortgage have been inserted in conformity with o 34, r 3 to 8, of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 to show that the mortgagor is also entitled to the return of all title deeds handed over to the mortgagee at the time of the mortgage. If the mortgage-deed comprises of other property, the mortgagor is not entitled to the return of the deed, but the mortgagee must covenant to produce it when required.<sup>3</sup> If the deeds are lost, the mortgagor is entitled to an indemnity,<sup>4</sup> and may also be entitled to compensation.<sup>5</sup>

(24) Restoration of Possession

If the mortgagee is in possession, he must on redemption restore possession to the mortgagor -- not only to the lands originally mortgaged, but all the lands that have come into his possession as mortgagee.<sup>6</sup> He must restore the lands in the same condition as when they were mortgaged. A lease granted by the mortgagee comes to an end when the land is redeemed.<sup>7</sup>

The mortgagee cannot be heard to say that he does not know what has happened to the mortgaged property.<sup>8</sup> If the lands have been lost through the negligence of the mortgagee, he is liable to account for them to the mortgagor.<sup>9</sup>

The Supreme Court has held that s 4-A of the Kerala Land Reforms Act 1963, which provides that certain mortgagees and lessees of mortgagees shall be deemed to be tenant, would not denude the right to repossession of the mortgagor under s 60, without assent of the President of India.<sup>10</sup>

A conjoint reading of s 60, s 76(h) and s 83 of the TP Act would amplify that on deposit of the mortgage amount in court, the contractual relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee ceases. The Supreme Court has held that the right to possession under s 60 of the TP Act, on redemption is kept unaffected by the Kerala Compensation of Tenants' Improvements Act 1958, which only hedges the right to eviction and gives the tenant a right to remain subject to the terms of his lease or mortgage till the payment for improvements are made or deposited, so that the mortgagee/tenant is not driven to a separate suit.<sup>11</sup>

(25) Reconveyance

The right of the mortgagor to a reconveyance is not limited to the case of an English mortgage -- but (except in the case of an English mortgage) it is seldom insisted on in India. If the mortgage-money is paid and the mortgage redeemed, it is not necessary that the redemption should be proved by a registered instrument.<sup>12</sup> The mortgagor must pay for the cost of the reconveyance which has been described as a useful protection, being evidence of the removal of the cloud on title created by the mortgage.<sup>13</sup> As an alternative, the mortgagor may require a registered acknowledgment that the mortgage is not outstanding. Special provision is made in this section for the registration of this acknowledgment in the case of registered mortgages, for s 17(l)(b) of the Registration Act 1908 would not apply, if the mortgage was for less than Rs 100.

(26) By Act of Parties

The right of redemption may be extinguished by act of parties or by operation of law. 's Act of parties's refers to some transaction subsequent to the mortgage and standing apart from the mortgage transaction; otherwise it would be invalid as a clog on redemption. Such a transaction may be oral.<sup>14</sup> In a mortgage by conditional sale, the right of redemption is not extinguished at the expiry of the period. This has been discussed in the note 's Mortgages by conditional sale's under s 58.

The insertion of a clause in the mortgage-deed that in default of payment the mortgage should operate as a sale is, therefore, not an act of parties's extinguishing the right of redemption.<sup>15</sup> If the mortgage stipulates that in default of payment, the mortgagee shall have a right to foreclose, the equity of redemption is not determined, unless the mortgagee obtains a decree for foreclosure. Otherwise, mere mutation to the name of the mortgagee in the revenue registers is not sufficient to extinguish that equity of redemption.<sup>16</sup> Subsequent to the mortgage, the mortgagee may purchase the equity or redemption from the mortgagor, and this is an extinction by act of parties. Instances of such purchasers have already been cited.<sup>17</sup> The equity of redemption is not, however, extinguished by a mere contract for sale.<sup>18</sup> So also, where a mortgagee having a power to sell the mortgaged property as provided in the mortgage-deed enters into a contract to sell the property in the purported exercise of that power, the mortgagor has still the right to redeem the property.<sup>19</sup>

Where, however, the mortgagor gave a power of sale to the mortgagee under s 69 and the mortgagee exercised the power and the purchaser paid the money which had been distributed, that would certainly discharge the mortgagee.<sup>20</sup>

In one case where a charge holder agreed to postpone his right over the property in favour of an equitable mortgage, it was held that such agreement did not extinguish his right to redeem the equitable mortgage.<sup>21</sup>

A usufructuary mortgagee cannot, by a mere assertion of his own or by a unilateral act on his part, convert his position on moiety of the property as mortgagee into that of an absolute owner. He can do so only if he purchases the entire equity of redemption from the mortgagor.<sup>22</sup>

(27) Mortgagee purchasing at a court sale

The effect of the mortgagee purchasing the equity of redemption at a court sale is complicated by the peculiar position of the mortgagee. The Calcutta High Court in an old case<sup>23</sup> described the mortgagee as a trustee. This, it is submitted, is incorrect, and it is clear that a mortgagee is not a trustee, for he has rights of his own which he can exercise adversely to the mortgagor.

Nevertheless, the mortgagee is under many obligations which are similar to those of a trustee, and which are entirely discussed in the notes under ss 64, 76(a), 76(g) and 69 of TP Act. Indeed, s 90 of the Indian Trusts Act 1882, itself provides that where a mortgagee availing himself of his position gains an advantage, he holds such advantage for the benefit of the mortgagor. This has been recognised by the Supreme Court in Sidhkamal Nayan v Bira Nayak,<sup>24</sup> and Mritunjay Pani v Naramanda Bala Sasmal.<sup>25</sup> It follows that the mortgagee can never benefit by his own default. So, if the mortgagee in possession makes default in payment of assessment, or rent, and then himself purchases the property at a sale, he is still liable to be redeemed.<sup>26</sup>

In Parichhan Mistry v Achhiabbar Mistry<sup>27</sup> where the mortgagor failed to pay rent to the landlord in respect of the holding as required under the mortgage deed and the mortgagee had paid the decretal amount in a suit for sale instituted by the landlord, the Supreme Court held that if for some default in payment of rent, a decree is obtained and the mortgagee pays off the same, even then the mortgage in question is liable to be redeemed at the option of the mortgagor. By virtue of the purchase of the property by the mortgagee in court sale, no merger takes place between the two rights, nor the mortgage stands extinguished.

The courts have never allowed the mortgagee to escape from his obligations by bringing the equity of redemption to sale in execution of a decree on the personal covenant.<sup>28</sup> By virtue of purchase of the property by the defendant/mortgagee in court sale, there was no merger in the defendant/mortgagee of two rights, extinguishing the mortgage. What proviso to s 60 contemplates is act of parties or a decree either for foreclosure, or putting the mortgaged property to sale.<sup>29</sup>

The evil consequences of such sales were described in the judgment of J Macpherson in Kamini Debi v Ramlochan Sircar.<sup>30</sup> Where the mortgagee had improperly sold the equity of redemption in execution of a money decree for the mortgage debt, J Macpherson said:

Without saying that an equity of redemption can never be seized and sold, I have no doubt that a mortgagee cannot properly in execution of a simple decree for a sum of money, the repayment of which is secured by a mortgage, attach and sell the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the property mortgaged, and that a mortgagee who attaches and sells his mortgagor's equity of redemption, and purchases it (directly or indirectly) himself, is a trustee, for the mortgagor, and cannot acquire an irredeemable title against him.

The Judicial Committee in Mahabir Pershad v Macnaghten,<sup>31</sup> approved this passage, but explained that it referred to a case of a mortgagee decree-holder who has purchased without the leave of the court, and then added that leave to bid puts an end to the disability of the mortgagee, and puts him in the same position as any independent purchaser.

Mahabir Pershad's case was that of a mortgagee purchasing with leave of the court at a sale in executing of his own mortgage decree, and the Judicial Committee held that he had acquired an irredeemable title. In Kamini Debi's case<sup>32</sup> J Macpherson, said:

One view of the matter is that, when the mortgagee purchases, the mortgage debt is satisfied. But I think that the more correct view is that the mortgagee purchasing, is a trustee for the mortgagor who still has the right to redeem.

The first view seems to have been adopted by the Allahabad High Court which at one time held that the mortgagee's purchase of even a portion of the property had the effect of extinguishing the whole mortgage<sup>33</sup> -- and, that too, irrespective of the question whether leave to bid had been obtained. However, these decisions were soon overruled.<sup>34</sup> The second is the correct view, but it should be limited to cases where the mortgagee is the decree-holder, and buys without leave of the court.

The law, therefore, is:

- (1) If the mortgagee, after obtaining leave to bid, purchases at a sale in execution of his decree, he gets an irredeemable title, and the equity of redemption is extinguished.<sup>35</sup>
- (2) If the mortgagee purchases without leave to bid at a sale in execution of his decree on the mortgage, he holds as trustee for the mortgagor, and the equity of redemption is not extinguished.<sup>36</sup>
- (3) If the mortgagee purchases at a sale in contravention of s 99 of the TP Act, or of o 34, r 14 of the Code of Civil Procedure he holds as trustee, and the equity of redemption is not extinguished.<sup>37</sup>
- (4) If the mortgagee purchases at a sale in execution of a decree, whether mortgage decree or money decree, obtained by a third person, he gets an irredeemable title and the equity of redemption is extinguished.<sup>38</sup>

In cases (2) & (3), the mortgagor must take objection in execution proceedings before the sale is confirmed, otherwise the equity of redemption is extinguished on confirmation of the sale.<sup>39</sup> So in a Madras case,<sup>40</sup> where the mortgagee had purchased the mortgaged property in execution of a money decree for an instalment of the mortgage debt, a member of the undivided family of the mortgagor born after the decree, but before the attachment and sale and not added as a party, was entitled to redeem his own share as not being bound by the sale, but was not allowed to redeem the share of the members of the joint family who were parties to the decree, and order for sale.

In a suit for redemption, unless it is a conditional sale or anomalous mortgage, so long as the sale is not confirmed, the debtor has a right to deposit the entire sale money including the sale expenses and poundage fee, and the court is under the statutory duty to accept the payment and direct redemption of the mortgage. The limited right given to the corporation under s 29 of the State Financial Corporation Act 1951, to act as an owner to bring the properties of the defaulter to sale does not have the effect of wiping out the statutory right of redemption under s 60 of the TP Act.<sup>41</sup>

In a Kerala case, the auction sale of the property was found to be void and since there was no foreclosure of the mortgage, it was held that the mortgagee had the right of redemption on deposit of an amount to which the financial corporation was entitled upto date in terms of s 60.<sup>42</sup>

(28) By Operation of Law

The section does not refer to the extinction of the equity of redemption by operation of law. This may occur by merger when the mortgagee acquires the equity of redemption by inheritance.<sup>43</sup> One co-mortgagor may by adverse possession acquire the equity of redemption of another co-mortgagor,<sup>44</sup> but the possession of a mortgagee can never be adverse to the mortgagor during the continuance of the mortgage. This could only occur if the mortgagee's possession were indicative of such an acquiescence on the part of the mortgagor as to amount to a release of the equity of redemption.<sup>45</sup> A forfeiture and sale under the Bombay Land Revenue Code for non-payment of assessment has the effect of extinguishing the equity of redemption.<sup>46</sup> However, where a mortgagee himself is liable to pay the land revenue, but allows it to remain in default and then purchases the property in sale for satisfaction of the land revenue, the mortgagee cannot be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong; and so the mortgage would still subsist.<sup>47</sup> A suit for redemption is not maintainable by a mortgagor who was not personally cultivating the suit lands on 4 December 1952 when jagirs were abolished under the Madhya Bharat Abolition of Jagirs Act, whereby the said mortgagors lost all their rights and interests in the respective lands.<sup>48</sup>

The decree referred to in the proviso to s 60 is a final decree in a suit for foreclosure, as provided in sub-r (2) of o 34, r 3 and a final decree in a redemption suit as provided in o 34, r 8(3)(a) of the Code of Civil Procedure. In a final decree in a suit for foreclosure, on failure of the defendant to pay all amounts due, the extinguishment of the right of redemption has to be specifically declared. Again, in a final decree in a suit for redemption of mortgage by conditional sale or for redemption of anomalous mortgage, the extinguishment of the right of redemption has to be specially declared, as provided in cl (a) of sub-r (3) of o 34, r 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In a suit for redemption of a mortgage other than a mortgage by a conditional sale or an anomalous mortgage, the mortgagor has a right of redemption even after the sale has taken place pursuant to the final decree, but before the confirmation of such sale. In view of these provisions, the question of merger of mortgage debt in the decretal debt does not at all arise.<sup>49</sup>

In foreclosure suits, the final decree extinguishes the equity of redemption. Until the final decree for foreclosure is made, the mortgagor can redeem even after the time fixed in the preliminary decree.<sup>50</sup> The court's jurisdiction to grant relief on equitable grounds does not by reason of the proviso to s 60 read with s 68 of the TP Act and o 34, rr 2 & 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure extend to the granting of a relief in proceedings taken in execution of a final decree for foreclosure. Accordingly, the court has no jurisdiction to re-open a final decree for foreclosure to extend the time for redemption.<sup>51</sup> However, in a case where the mortgagee under an arrangement with the mortgagor took possession before the order absolute for foreclosure, and the mortgagor raised no objection for many years, he was held to have lost his right of redemption by acquiescence.<sup>52</sup> The decisions of the Privy Council in Het Ram v Shadi Lal<sup>53</sup> and Matru Mal v Durga Kunwar<sup>54</sup> were based on the law as enacted in these sections. This seemed to imply that the right of redemption continued even after order absolute for sale, and the Calcutta High Court was constrained to construe s 89 as referring to the extinction of the right of redemption on the actual sale, and distribution of the sale proceeds.<sup>55</sup> This was doing violence to the section; but the section was bad law, for a decree for sale is but a judgment on the debt, and though the debt merges in the judgment, the collateral security of the mortgage does not merge.<sup>56</sup> The provision for the extinction of the right of redemption was, therefore, omitted in rr 5 and 8 of o 34. The Privy Council in Sukhi v Ghulam Safdar<sup>57</sup> said that the effect of this omission was that the law remained the same as it was before the passing of the TP Act. And before the TP Act a decree for sale did not have the effect of extinguishing the right of redemption.<sup>58</sup> The Allahabad High Court held that the effect of the repeal of s 89 was that the right of redemption was not extinguished by the decree for sale, but by the sale.<sup>59</sup> The legislature has, however, made the law quite clear, for rr 5 and 8 as amended by Act 21 of 1929, expressly states that the mortgagor's right of redemption subsists till the confirmation of the sale held in execution of the decree for sale on a mortgage or, in a suit for redemption, until the final decree.<sup>60</sup> A Bench of the Calcutta High Court seemed to accept this;<sup>61</sup> but another Bench took the opposite view on the ground that the amending Act 21 of 1929 was not retrospective.<sup>62</sup> After the section of the TP Act was transferred to the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, the High Court of Calcutta has held that a mortgagor can have a sale set aside under o 21, r 89.<sup>63</sup> if the mortgagor obtains a decree for redemption and the decree does not provide that in default of payment of the mortgagor, he shall be debarred of all right to redeem, the right to redeem is not extinguished, and the mortgagor can file another suit for redemption. This has now been settled by the Privy Council in Bhaiya Raghunath Singh v Hansraj Kunwar.<sup>64</sup> In that case, the decree was that in default of payment, the suit for redemption should be dismissed. Their Lordships said:

The right to redeem is a right conferred upon the mortgagor by enactment, of which he can only be deprived by means and in the manner enacted for that purpose, and strictly complied with. In the present case, the only basis for the claim that the right to redeem has been extinguished is s 60; but in their Lordships's view the old decree cannot properly be construed as doing that which it does not purport to do, viz as extinguishing the right to redeem.

The Privy Council in the above case pointed out that in the first suit the issue was whether the plaintiff was then entitled to redeem, and in the second suit, the issue is whether he is now entitled to redeem. It is correctly pointed out by the Bombay High Court, following the above decision of the Privy Council, that in each case it would be a question of fact whether the earlier decree involves a decision that the mortgagor's right to redeem was extinguished. In that case, it was held that the decree provided that if there was any default in the payment of instalments, the right to redeem would be extinguished.<sup>65</sup> It is perhaps unnecessary to add that if the first suit is pending, the second suit will not lie.<sup>66</sup> But so long as the equity of redemption is not extinguished, successive suits for redemption will lie.<sup>67</sup>

The mortgagors filed a suit for redemption of mortgage. A preliminary decree for redemption was passed. The mortgagors failed to make payment within the specified period under the preliminary decree. On an application made by the mortgagee, a final decree for sale was passed in the suit. The final decree for sale of the mortgaged property was passed. But the mortgagee did not get it executed and allowed the same to be time-barred. The mortgagee, and, after him, his heirs and legal representatives, however, continued to be in possession of the mortgaged property. Subsequently, the successors-in-interest of the original mortgagors filed a second suit for redemption of the mortgages. It was held that the plea that, as a final decree was passed in the earlier redemption suit, there was a merger of the mortgage-debt in the decretal-debt and, as such, the second suit for redemption was barred, would not be sustainable.<sup>68</sup>

The principle that in a suit for redemption of a mortgage other than a mortgage by conditional sale or an anomalous mortgage, the mortgagor has a right of redemption even after the sale has taken place pursuant to the final decree but before the confirmation of such a sale and that in such a case, the question of merger of mortgage debt in the decretal debt does not arise, is held by the Supreme Court to apply to a sale which has taken place pursuant to an order under s 32 of the State Financial Corporation Act, in so far as the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in o 34, r 5, which in substance permit the judgment debtor to redeem the mortgage even during the proceedings in execution of a final decree for sale, unless the equity of redemption has got extinguished, are concerned.<sup>69</sup>

When in execution of a mortgage decree, the mortgaged property is sold and the purchaser sues for possession of the property mortgaged, a minor son of the mortgagor who is discharged from the suit is not entitled to redeem the mortgage, unless the mortgage decree, and the sale are set aside.<sup>70</sup>

The withdrawal of the redemption suit does not extinguish the equity of redemption so as to bar a fresh suit.<sup>71</sup> In Thota China Subba Rao v Mattapalli Raju,<sup>72</sup> the Federal Court reversed a Madras judgment to the contrary,<sup>73</sup> and pointed out, approving a line of Bombay decisions,<sup>74</sup> that the right of redemption being a statutory right could only be extinguished as provided in s 60. If it is alleged to be extinguished by a decree, the decree should run strictly in accordance with the form prescribed for the purpose. If the right is not so extinguished, provisions such as o 9, r 9 or o 23, r 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure will not debar the mortgagor from bringing a second suit for redemption as the cause of action is a different one under a subsisting mortgage.

Successive suits for redemption of mortgage can be filed till the right of redemption is not extinguished. This is because the right of redemption is an incident of subsisting mortgage and inseparable from it, so that the right is co-extinguished with the mortgage itself.<sup>75</sup>

In a case where the first redemption suit was dismissed as the result of a compromise without regard to the fact that the plaintiff was a minor, a fresh suit was maintainable.<sup>76</sup> So also when the first redemption suit was dismissed for default;<sup>77</sup> when the mortgagee's decree for sale in the first suit was not executed;<sup>78</sup> or the mortgagor's decree for redemption could not be executed as it was time-barred;<sup>79</sup> and also when the first redemption suit abated by reason of the death of the mortgagor-plaintiff.<sup>80</sup> However, if the decree extinguishes the mortgage, a second suit is barred by res judicata; and it is immaterial that the decree was erroneous.<sup>81</sup>

However, as the abatement of a suit does not amount to a decree extinguishing the right of redemption if a suit for redemption abates, the second suit for redemption is not barred. The provisions of o 22, r 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not override the provisions of this section. So long as the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee continues, and so long as the right to redeem has not been extinguished by the act of the parties, the mortgagor is entitled to go to a court of law to enforce his right of redemption.<sup>82</sup>

(29) Suit for Redemption

A suit for redemption is a suit to enforce the right to redeem. Such a suit may be filed not only by the mortgagor, but by any person mentioned in s 91. He must show that this was a subsisting mortgage.<sup>83</sup> It was held that the preliminary decree in the suit for redemption of mortgage should be drawn up in accordance with o 34, r 7 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There should be a direction, first for an account being taken of the decree for principal and interest on the mortgage and, thereafter, a declaration ought to be made of the amount, if any, to be paid to the defendant. A decree shall thereafter be passed for payment by the party as liable to pay the same on account being taken in. If the defendant is held liable, then the decree may be passed against her for refund of the excess amount said to have been recovered illegally by her from the plaintiffs.<sup>84</sup> The forms of decree enforcing redemption are enacted in o 34, rr 7 and 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. All persons interested in the right of redemption or in the security must be joined as parties -- o 34, r 1. The suit can only be instituted after the right has accrued, ie, after the principal money has become due. It is not necessary to tender the mortgage money before filing the suit.

The mortgagee is entitled to hold against everyone who has not a paramount title.<sup>85</sup> The plaintiff must, therefore, prove his title to redeem.<sup>86</sup> In Sevvaji Raghunadha v Chinna Nayana,<sup>87</sup> the Judicial Committee said:

A plaintiff who alleges that his ancestor, 44 years ago, made a mortgage to the ancestor possessor, must prove his case clearly and indefeasibly. He must succeed by the strength of his own title, and not by reason by the weakness of his opponent's s.

Prima facie evidence will, however, shift the burden of proofs. In Raja Kishen Dutt v Narendar,<sup>88</sup> where the mortgage deed was lost and the plaintiff claimed to redeem, the Privy Council said:

It appears to their Lordships that in such a case as the present, it lies upon the plaintiff to substantiate his case by some evidence, by some prima facie evidence at least. But in this, as in most other cases, when the quantum of evidence required from either party is to be considered, regard must be had to the opportunities which each party may naturally be supposed to have of giving evidence; and although the prima facie burden of proof in this case in their Lordships's view is upon the plaintiff, still they think the consideration should not be omitted that the defendant would naturally have the mortgage, and that it would be, prima facie at all events, more in his power to give accurate evidence of its contents than in that of the plaintiff.

In an old Bombay case,<sup>89</sup> it was said that it was not the practice in India for a counterpart of the deed to be taken by the mortgagor and, therefore, very slight proof that a mortgage had originally been made would serve to shift the entire burden of proof on the defendants. But the prima facie evidence must be forthcoming.<sup>90</sup> If the plaintiff fails to prove the specific mortgage on which he sues, he may succeed on defendant's admission in the suit that he is holding the land under a mortgage;<sup>91</sup> or if the defendant produces another deed of mortgage.<sup>92</sup> However, the defendant's admission made in another proceeding is not sufficient.<sup>93</sup> An agreement for sale in favour of a mortgagee is no defence to such a suit;<sup>94</sup> nor can the mortgagee resist redemption by denying the mortgagor's s title to the property.<sup>95</sup>

On mortgaged property coming to the share of one co-sharer during partition, he mortgages the same and fixes the period of redemption. The mortgager dies without redeeming his mortgage within the prescribed time. It was held that the heirs of the mortgager are entitled to redeem the mortgaged property after expiry of the period fixed. It was immaterial if the mortgagee has accepted the debt from a stranger, and delivered possession thereafter.<sup>96</sup>

Where the decree in a redemption suit became final and during the execution proceedings the erstwhile mortgagor deposited the mortgage amount, and consequently, the executing court ordered delivery of property on such payment to the decree holder, the erstwhile mortgagees in possession were not entitled to get the benefit of s 4-A of the Kerala Land Reform Act 1964 and become 's deemed tenant's of the mortgaged property because once the amount is deposited by the mortgagor decree-holder even during the execution proceedings, the relationship between the parties as mortgagor and the mortgagee ceases and thereafter, till the actual delivery of possession, the erstwhile mortgagee in possession remains merely as judgement-debtor in illegal possession.<sup>97</sup>

The proceedings in a preliminary decree does not get terminated by dismissal of the first application for passing of final decree or for non-prosecution. Till date of passing the final decree and its execution, or till remedy is barred by limitation under art 137 of the schedule to the limitation Act 1963, the court has power and jurisdiction to entertain the application to pass the final decree. At any time before the remedy is barred, it is open to the plaintiff to deposit the redemption money under the preliminary decree. The dismissal of the earlier application or non-prosecution, therefore, does not per se bar the right of the plaintiff. But if remedy to enforce preliminary decree for the redemption is barred by the limitation, thereafter the right remains unenforceable. The deposit therefore, is non est and the court cannot proceed to pass final decree as the remedy is lost.<sup>98</sup>

The provisions of s 60 and 71 clearly provide that once a mortgage always a mortgage and once the mortgagee has been admitted, the responsibility of mortgagees is to convey the property mortgaged after accepting the mortgage money, and the equity of redemption cannot be lost. Section 60 of the TP Act confers a statutory right of redemption. It is an inviolable right of the mortgagor, on redemption to get back the subject of mortgage.<sup>99</sup>

(30) Right to Redeem Acquired by Adverse Possession

In Purshottam v Sagaji,<sup>1</sup> a right to redeem was acquired by adverse possession by a mortgagor who had no title when the deed was executed.

Illustration

In 1873, the widow of the deceased owner granted a mortgage to G, the husband of her daughter R. On the widow's death the plaintiffs claimed the property as reversionary heirs and disputed the mortgage. The dispute was settled by G accepting a mortgage from the plaintiffs for a reduced amount, on 22 June 1882. The plaintiffs had then no title, for R was the true heir and had acquiesced in ignorance of her rights. R on discovering that she was the heir, sold the property and her vendee paid off the mortgage of 1873. The plaintiffs then sued to redeem the mortgage of 1882. It was held that the plaintiffs had a right to redeem. As between the plaintiffs and G, the mortgage of 1873 had been treated as having come to an end. G held the property as mortgagee of the plaintiffs, and though G's possession was not in its inception by virtue of a right derived from the plaintiffs, yet, as from 22 June 1882, it was under colour of a right derived from the plaintiffs and so, adverse to R, and that to her knowledge.<sup>2</sup>

(31) Limitation

Limitation for a suit for redemption is, under art 61(a) of the Act of 1963, 30 years from the time when the right to redeem accrues.<sup>3</sup> Within that period, the mortgagor is entitled to redeem if the mortgage has not been foreclosed.<sup>4</sup> The period of 30 years is to be computed from the date when the mortgagor is entitled to redeem.<sup>5</sup> It has been held that after the expiry of the said period, not only the remedy to file a suit for redemption of the mortgage is barred, but the right in the property in dispute is also extinguished in view of s 27 of the Limitation Act 1963<sup>6</sup>

In a 99-years mortgage, the starting point for the period of limitation would commence from the expiry of period of 99 years, and not from the date of mortage itself.<sup>7</sup>

The Gujrat High Court,<sup>8</sup> relying on Lila Chand v Malappa Tukaram,<sup>9</sup> held that the period of limitation under art 61A of the Limitation Act 1963, is 30 years when the right to redeem or recover possession accrues. Since the mortgage-deed was executed on 8 March 1947, and the suit was filed in the year 1976, only 29 years period had been completed. Hence, the suit was held to be within limitation.

Section 30 of the Limitation Act 1963 provides that where the period of limitation is shorter than the one prescribed by the Limitation Act 1908, the same may be instituted within a period of seven years next after the commencement of the Act, which came into force on 5 October 1963. On facts, in a Punjab & Haryana case,<sup>10</sup> it was found that the plaintiff's suit for redemption of mortgage filed within five years next after the commencement of the Limitation Act 1963 was within the period of limitation. However, in another Punjab & Haryana case,<sup>11</sup> it is held that such limitation period as provided in the Limitation Act 1963 would extend by 7 years by virtue of s 39; meaning thereby, since a period of 30 years has been prescribed for limitation, a further 7 years would be added, thus, making limitation period for redemption of mortgage as 37 years.

A minor mortgagor's suit to redeem will not be barred under s 7 of the Limitation Act, because a co-mortgagor could have redeemed during his minority.<sup>12</sup> As the mortgage security is indivisible, limitation for a suit for redemption will not be saved by an acknowledgment made by one of the heirs of the mortgagee.<sup>13</sup> But in a case from Bombay,<sup>14</sup> the heirs of the mortgagee had effected a partition, and the suit for redemption was filed after the period of limitation had expired. One of the heirs had acknowledged the existence of the mortgage, and that acknowledgment was held to save limitation as to his share, though redemption of that share was allowed on payment of the whole amount due on the mortgage.

(32) Notice

The mortgagee may stipulate for notice before redemption after due date. This is in order to enable him to find another investment. In India, the mortgagee is entitled to three months notice especially in presidency-towns. The omission to give notice would not be a bar to a suit for redemption, but probably, the mortgagee would be entitled to six months's interest in lieu of notice.<sup>15</sup>

(33) Redemption Suit by Benamidar

The Judicial Committee have held that an action can be maintained by a benamidar in respect of property, although the beneficial owner is in no way a party to it.<sup>16</sup> A benamidar may sue to redeem a mortgage granted by him as benamidar of the real owner, and so may the heirs of the benamidar mortgagor, or their assigns.<sup>17</sup> However, the real owner is also, of course, entitled to sue.<sup>18</sup> These judgements will not hold good, after promulgation of the Benami Transaction (Prohibition) Act 1988.

(34) Redemption Suit by Purchaser of Property

A right of redemption does not remain independent of the property itself. A sale of property, that too to a stranger, who had nothing to do with the mortgage and who was not a party to the same would convey a complete title of the property to him, and once the title to that property goes, the equity of redemption shall also accompany the property. In short, the purchaser would then be in a position to substitute himself in place of the plaintiff, and to step in the latter's shoes.<sup>19</sup>

However, in Panchanansharma v Basudeo Prasad Jaganani<sup>20</sup> the purchaser bought the property in a sale initiated due to default of a usufructuary mortgagee to pay land revenue as required under s 76(c). On the question whether the usufructuary mortgagor still had the right to redeem, the Supreme Court held that at best, the auction-purchaser, on redemption, would look to the mortgagee who had committed default in terms of the mortgage and the possession of the purchaser be on behalf of the mortgagee and becomes liable to accounting, rather than the mortgagor losing his title due to the misfeasance committed by the mortgagee, and the property being sold on account thereof to the third parties.

(35) Partial Redemption

The last proviso of this section recognises the principle of the indivisibility of the mortgage security. A part-owner or purchaser of part of the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem the whole mortgage,<sup>21</sup> but is not entitled to redeem his share only.<sup>22</sup> The reason for this rule is that the disintegration of the mortgage security would result in great injustice to the mortgagee. The Judicial Committee in Nilakant v Suresh Chunder<sup>23</sup> said:

It would put him to a separate suit against each purchaser of a fragment of the equity of redemption though purchasing without his consent, and he would have separate suits against each of them, and suits in which no one of the parties would be bound by anything which took place in a suit against another. Different proportions of value might be struck in the different suits, and the utmost confusion and embarrassment would be created.

A co-mortgagor cannot be permitted to redeem his own share of the mortgaged property only on payment of proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, as this would break the integrity of the mortgage.<sup>24</sup>

Where, out of a number of mortgagees, only one of them acquires by purchase a part (one half) of the mortgaged property, the mortgage will remain undivided and, if redeemed at all, can be redeemed in its entirety. There is no merger.<sup>25</sup>

There may be a special condition in the mortgage-deed recognizing the mortgagor's shares as subject to a separate redemption,<sup>26</sup> or there may be partial redemption as a matter of subsequent bargain, or arrangement between all the parties interested.<sup>27</sup> Otherwise neither the mortgagor, nor the mortgagee can get relief except in consonance with the principle of indivisibility -- for the character of indivisibility exists both with reference to the mortgagor, and to the mortgagee.<sup>28</sup> Therefore, the mortgagor of a share is entitled to redeem the whole mortgage, although the mortgagee is prepared to allow redemption of the share only.<sup>29</sup> A lessee of a share of the property mortgaged can redeem the whole property.<sup>30</sup> However, when the indivisibility of a mortgage is broken by purchase, inheritance or otherwise, a partial redemption can be allowed.<sup>31</sup>

An adjustment between a prior mortgagee and a subsequent mortgagee cannot be recognised as it would be a partial redemption.<sup>32</sup> The section has application so long as the mortgage continues without being modified or split up by agreement between parties. By the amendment introduced in the proviso, it is no doubt true that the other modes of splitting up of the integrity of a mortgage were practically intended to be registered, and the only way by which the integrity would be broken is in the manner laid down in the last clause of s 60. But that is only when there is no modification of the mortgage by consent of the parties.<sup>33</sup>

The vesting of portion of the mortgaged property with the government and the subsequent assignment of mortgaged right in favour of the government, are not sufficient to formulate the exception provided in the last paragraph of s 60 of the TP Act.<sup>34</sup>

(36) After the Amendment

It is submitted that by the amendment of the section by the insertion of the word 's only,'s the first two exceptions are abolished, and the third alone remains. The effect of the amendment is detailed as below:

(i) Where the mortgagee allows redemption of a share--

Under the amended section, the fact that the mortgagee has allowed a sharer in the equity of redemption to redeem his share will not justify partial redemption as to the rest.<sup>35</sup> So also, the integrity of a mortgage is not broken, if one of the mortgagees acquires the interest of the mortgagor.<sup>36</sup> The mortgage of that share will be extinguished by the redemption, but as to the residue, there will be an indivisible mortgage. This was the view of the Allahabad High Court even before the amendment, and cases to that effect have already been cited.<sup>37</sup>

(ii) Release of a share by the mortgagee--

Under the amended section, the fact that the mortgagee releases part of the property mortgaged does not justify partial redemption as to the rest.<sup>38</sup> Thus, when three properties X, Y and Z were mortgaged and the mortgagee released X from the mortgage, Y and Z were liable for the whole amount of the mortgage, and subsequent transferees of Y and Z could not claim that they were liable only for a share of the mortgage debt.<sup>39</sup> In some cases before the amendment, the purchaser got relief by being allowed partial redemption, which was in effect making the mortgagee contribute. This was wrong, for the obligation of contribution under s 82 is not personal, but attaches to the property. The purchaser gets relief not against the mortgagee, but against the share of the property released by the mortgagee. This he must get after he has redeemed the whole mortgage. This view of the law was taken even before the amendment by the Allahabad High Court in Jugal Kishore Sahu v Kedar Nath,<sup>40</sup> and by the Madras High Court in Perumal v Raman Chettiar.<sup>41</sup>

(iii) Acquisition by the mortgagee of a share in the property--

The law on this case has not been altered. If the mortgagee acquires a share in the property, the integrity of the mortgage is broken, and a sharer in the rest of the property is entitled to redeem his own share. The onus lies on the mortgagee to prove that no part of the mortgage debt was extinguished.<sup>42</sup> However, it is open to a co-mortgagor to redeem the entire mortgage despite the mortgagee.<sup>43</sup> If the integrity of the mortgage is broken by the mortgagee purchasing a share and there are several mortgagors, each mortgagor is entitled to redeem his own share, and there is no equity in favour of redeeming more than his share.<sup>44</sup> Cases on this point are still good law, and it does not matter whether the acquisition was by purchase, inheritance or otherwise. The share of the mortgagor means the interest of the mortgagor after the creation of the mortgage.<sup>45</sup> The third para of s 60 does not apply to a maintenance decree which creates a charge.<sup>46</sup>

Where the mortgagee had already disintegrated the mortgage by agreeing to redemption of three-fourths of the land, the rule against partial redemption cannot apply. In fact, in the circumstances, the redemption cannot be called 's partial's'.<sup>47</sup>

Illustrations to (iii) above

(1) A mortgages property to his wife B in satisfaction of a debt for dower. After the deaths of A and B, their daughter C sues to enforce the mortgage. C as one of the heirs of A is entitled to one-eleventh share of A's estate. The integrity of the mortgage is broken, and the other heirs are entitled to redeem ten-elevenths of the property mortgaged for their share of the debt.<sup>48</sup>

(2) A mortgages property to B. A then sells one-third of the property to C, one-third to D, and one-third to the mortgagee B. The integrity of the mortgage is broken, and C may redeem his one-third share for one-third of the debt.

(3) Where it was agreed between a usufructuary mortgagee and a co-mortgagor that a co-mortgagor should have liberty to redeem his two-fifths share of the property on payment of the amount for which he was proportionately liable, which amount was also determined by apportionment between the co-mortgagors and a preliminary decree was passed in terms of the arrangement in the presence of the other co-mortgagor, it was held that the mortgage security was split up, and the co-mortgagor in whose favour the preliminary decree was passed was not entitled to redeem the entire mortgage after the passing of the preliminary decree.<sup>49</sup>
